Pioneer Days Continued from page 2 "Good old Fido!" The smothering drifts were beating about the faces of the three, and sucking at their breath like a fiend, but now they by-passed the stable and headed straight for the sheep pasture, Fido taking the lead, happily at last that he was being understood. "Hark!" said the younger son. "Wasn't that the bleating of a sheep?" Fido's sharp ears picked up the familiar sound and away he raced to the side of a great snow mound where he began to dig furiously. He knew the sheep were there under the snow and it was his business to help dig them out. "Good old Fido!" chorused the boys. "We'll be with you in a jiffy. Take it easy, doggie!" Now the shovels were put to good use, each digger making for himself a separate tunnel, but all converging towards the centre of the drift. Every few minutes they would rest and listen. Could it be possible the sheep still lived? The boys didn't think so; but John Scott said Fido knew what he was up to. Just at that moment the plaintive "ma-a-ah" of the flock's sire reached the diggers' ears. There was no mistaking old Billy's raspy voice; so all hands fell to work with a hopeful heart. Soon the ram was brought to the surface, and Fido took charge of him at once, licking his face and dancing about in high glee. Farther on, and close under the snow-mound, they came upon the rest of the flock closely huddled together for warmth. Only three were dead. The $94 question was how to get them back to the fold. After a bit of discussion on the subject John Scott shouldered the ram and set off at a snail's pace. The boys each picked up a sheep and followed. It was hard work, but at last all were safely rescued.
