

W.C.T.U. NOTES

"CAN I BE POPULAR IF I NEVER DRINK?"

An informal fireside discussion on this youth question continued for more than an hour, arousing much interest and revealing many viewpoints. The topic has lately been of much interest in some of the girls' schools, among "subsides."

Older pleasure-seekers who have tired of one another's company may believe it necessary to "liven the party" with alcoholic beverages. To such a group, pleasure seems to be something to be captured and held by whatever means available. The host may say: "Every one will get along all right after the drinks have been passed around. Fortunately, there is nobody in this crowd who gets violent or drowsy. Mostly they will talk more than they mean to and tell more than they should, but nobody is really listening anyway!" A picture of a perfect evening?

To young people with zest and capacity for a variety of recreational activities, a party with alcoholic accompaniments is usually display or merely imitation. If the young people are earning the money that will be spent for a good time, they are likely to realize that half the amount that would be spent for liquor will go farther in providing a wholesome good time for every one. Of course, if the funds (or worse, the drinks) are handed out by older persons who want their children "to have the best of everything", the young people may be pitied. They are having a poor introduction to what parties and good times really mean.

Allied Youth posts in America meet such a problem by opening homes and club-rooms for parties that are wholesome, companionable, good fun—and free from alcohol. It is important that friends of temperance should be ready to draw into their social circles for good times the groups that would otherwise be attracted while lonely and unnoticed to the drinking crowd.

Allied Youth has offered to youth a type of program in which extension and educational work, character-building influences, and wholesome fellowship may be combined. The current manual of this national movement gives suggestions for many activities that will help young people to be deeply conscious of the choices and situations that must be met, socially and individually, in this field of daily living.

In one's relations with other people, in informal and friendly discussion, in home situations, and elsewhere, a growing number of young people stand sturdily for "dry ways of living" without giving offense or invoking prejudice.

ALCOHOL STILL INTOXICATES

Changes in public policy do not change the nature of alcohol nor its effects. It is alcohol that we must judge, both as to our own relations to it and the long-range social result.

The liquor dealers advertise in many magazines; their "ads" are on the street cars, too. And on the movie screens—pictures of happy, laughing girls and wholesome, healthy lads—But where's their finished product? It's never in the "ads" (W. M. S. Magazine).
