Charm In Sequestered Spot, Initials Are Carved In Bark

The sunshine and gentle warming wind wrought a Spring loveliness over the drab fields this morning. It encouraged housewives at their "for Sunday" tidying and baking, and called the children to a first farm-stroll. They excused, three from the house across the lane: Granddaughter, Mack, and Alex, the big shaggy collie their happy attendant as far as their own "September Island" up the creek. To reach this sequestered spot which holds much charm for them, one coming to lane's end must turn to enter that rolling lengthy field which runs by the roadside and is referred to in the family as "the field across the creek" which is of course the millstream. There along a beaten path, patting hard by herd and flock and angler, one presently arrives at the spring. In the lee of a steep cliff fashioned by Nature for it against the hillside, it gushes forth crystal clear between fissures of sandstone and runs solemnly down to meet the stream below. To kneel there and drink of its flow which many a one has savored through time, is for the family a rite of sorts. And for one of us to pass by without drinking is to feel a sense of loss because there is a rare satisfaction to be had in its water, unmatched by that one may get, good as these are, from pump or faucet about. There is a legend handed down in the family—James speaks of it sometimes—that when one of his forebears was about to bid a youngish farewell to her world of suffering she was asked if she entertained any wish her dear ones might fulfill. "I wish I might have a drink from the spring," she said.

Dried Beef Promoted To Gourmet Category

Remember when dried beef was about the cheapest type of beef you could buy. Then, it was a food homemaker often served creamed at the end of the week when the food budget was at its almshest. It tasted good but was dubbed ordinary fare. Today, the price is sky high! Dried beef comes packaged in glass tumbler (very hard to open, too) and, because it's extensively snobbish, has become a favorite tidbit on the nibbling tray at parties. Use as a filling in shredded fine, mixed with cream cheese, pickle relish and the like, rolled into balls and presented on pics. Such treats are not for me!

OLD-FASHIONED WAY
Dyed-in-the-wool New Englander that I am, I like my dried beef prepared in the old-fashioned way. Whenever I see it listed on a restaurant menu I order it—whatever the time of day, whatever the price. Last week I discovered it on a breakfast menu in Baltimore at $1.60 a portion. I decided to skimp on lunch money and splurge on the first meal of the day.

MARY HAYWORTH

Child Lacking Home Love Has Insecure Feelings

Dear Mary Haworth: Being a widow living adjacent to several young couples, and loving children, I have nothing to do but meddle—the neighbors think. But I can't help remarking when I see parents abuse and mistreat their children.

The mothers are wage-earners who come home tired and snappish, and none hereabouts knows how to properly care for children. Which is none of my business, I suppose, but I would love to help one dear little girl in particular—Cissie, who is 10.

She is the eldest of three sisters, all devoted to each other. Cissie has asthma, doesn't do well in school and lives in terror of failing her grades, because, as she says: "Mama will beat me!" How dreadful.

Cissie's classmates know she is beaten when she gets low marks, which adds to her insecurity feelings. She is in a class with very bright children and the effort to keep up brings on these asthma attacks. When I ventured to plead Cissie's case to her mother—urgency, reassurance, praise and affection—the mother snappily: "She's just lazy and doesn't want to study."

BUSYBODY
The sisters' joy and delight when they visit me, where they can play the piano and read good books for children, are pitiful to see. But they suck their fingers; and I have nice furniture—so the wet fingerprints are a problem, and I don't encourage them. Their parents can't afford a maid and it worries me when children, that makes Cissie and her sisters undesirable guests, in your opinion. They might smudge your nice furniture, you explain. So, despite the joy and delight they radiate, in gaining admission to your residence and getting to touch your piano and books, you feel compelled to ease them out again, to save the surface of your belongings, which clearly shows that you put material show ahead of these children's human welfare, when the chips are down.

PROVE LOVE IN ACTION
Thus it's a case of pot calling kettle black, for you to deplore the parents' selfishness, when you manifest the same limitation on love.

I have a suggestion, to-wit: Go bargain hunting for stout washable slip coverings (or make them yourself) for the furniture; and when equipped with this insurance against sticky fingers, open your home and your heart to the children, and make them feel truly welcome.

Instead of fuming about the parents' deficiencies, utilize your opportunity to make up the difference. If you do love children, as you claim, Providence invites you to prove it in action, by putting self in second place, and using your worldly goods to enrich the experience of these walls

CRITIC FAILS OWN TEST
Dear G.G.: Well, now, I wonder if you, too, are being tested and found wanting, on the score of rightly loving the pitiful Cissie and her sisters—loving them in accordance with their needs of warm acceptance by some dependably kindhearted; and in proportion to your literal capacity to be hospitable.

You mention their finger sucking, caused by inner tenseness, you say—an attempt at self-consolation (psychologists tell us) on the part of emotionally rejected
