ELLEN'S DIARY

Neighbor Friend Comes To Help Alderlea's Men

Noon yesterday brought another to lend our farmers a hand at the shearing: a tall, Scottish, bachelor-man. A good farmer. Indeed, so kind he is to e v e r y creature, we, having known him since a child, have often wondered why such a one, who could make a woman happy, is destined, by choice it would seem, to live without a wife. So his fine home lacks a farmwife. And all the time, the herd and flock multiply, the crops flourish on the highly productive old fields.

Jamie too joined them, and altogether it was an encouraging number they had shorn by the time the evening had faded the afterglow and set its own star in the blue above ahill.

And James coming to the old armchair then declared "Though it's never a chore I look forward to eagerly, today I enjoyed it."

"It was the company" we said.

"Yes" he smiled, "and it is true that 'many hands' do lighten the work."

This morning it was continued. "We couldn't have better days for it" the younger farmer offered, when they were about to set out to it in the little truck. "It keeps sunny. And it's pleasantly cool there in the pen in that pasture. It's not much fun tussling with a restless sheep, if the day is hot!"

"Nice fleeces they're giving us" James said, coming by. "Now, fair-good, this year I'd say."

The little sitting goldfinch knows. In a lesson for us, and one we pointed out to the children, she it was, who gathered the shreds of discards, the little bits and pieces of wool caught on the fence by the lane and out of those lost and useless, she fashioned a home in the rosebush!

"I think that poplar is dead. It looks as to me" Mack said surveying that at the gateway this evening. "It budded, but never came into leaf. Reckon it will have to come down one of these times."

Planted by the younger farmer when a boy, because he is one who "Would buy a farm for the trees and groves about the house!" it has been our interesting friend through the years. On summer days when not a breath of wind stirred, we have loved its elfin ripples — the strange dance of its leaves. In the evenings too, as they rustled with a passing sigh, when all else about was still.

Suddenly this evening Scamp barked fretfully, eyes to the shortcut which leads to the farm.

"Must see something — one of the cats perhaps" Mack offered, scanning the distance. "It won't be the long-furred black one, at any rate" he commented with a sigh. "And do you know, I miss him! A real Hallowe'en cat he was — big and black and green-eyed."

"And knowing" we said.

"Well, if he hadn't been prowling away from home and got himself up a tree on that fellow thought he was a 'coon after their chickens, he might have been coming on that path right now — "Oh," he smiled "it's the littlest one — dark with one light toe on each hind foot, remember? She's been to the mill, hoping to catch a squirrel or a bird—Here, kitty — kitty!" so called, going down in the cats' light to meet her.

So our black cat is no more — He is gone — as now almost gone too is this day.

Until tomorrow — Diary— Good-night.....

MARY HAWORTH

Mother Seeks Advice For Her Unhappy Daughter

Dear Mary Haworth: I desperately need your advice for my daughter, as I don't know how to help her.

I am a woman alone, a job holder the last 15 years. With my parents' help I reared a son and daughter (now married) to be good human beings and good citizens. It was hard going to keep them nicely dressed and have even a simple home. Their father was alcoholic and irresponsible and I found we were better off without him.

Leah is 26, nas a little girl, age 3, and has been married for five years to man whom she doesn't love and who shows ill-will for her. He adores the baby but hardly ever takes Leah out, is very jealous, and she feels no companionship with him.

Before marriage he told her he had a sizable bank account; therefore she decided it was better to marry him and have a nice home than be poor as we had been. As it turned out, he had no bank account, but a fairly good job, and he provides well for her and the child.

They bought a house in the suburbs and he works very hard and doesn't drink or stay out. But she says she can't continue living like this, as he refuses to go anywhere with her. They have been to a movie maybe twice in four years.

She feels trapped, gets no pleasure from housekeeping, just works mechanically. She is very nervous and sometimes screams at the baby, which she doesn't mean to. She tries to reason with her husband, but he either doesn't answer or there is a big argument. Twice he has struck her.

She is asking me if I think she ought to leave him. I don't know what to tell her. I know how hard it is to keep a home for a child, while working; yet I believe Leah could make good if she had to (she is a dignified, pretty girl). She realizes it wouldn't be easy; but actually feels ill and very confused at present. Please advise us.

K.Y.

Dear K.Y.: You write from a great metropolis, where family relations counselling is readily available in face-to-face sessions between client and specialist. And it is help of this type that Leah must have, to steer her safely through the present crisis and keep her off the reefs of a nervous breakdown.

As of now, her tension, feelings of physical illness, sense of confusion, etc., indicate that she is coasting towards emotional collapse, if she doesn't get hold of herself in time.

Very likely her depression is fostered by (if not entirely due to) her husband's jealous, selfish, noncooperative insistence on confining her to a shut-in routine. It appears that he is gloomily (perhaps vengefully) aware that she doesn't love him and never has, really; that he won her with false pretenses about money.

In consequence, we may infer, he is meanly opposed to taking her out socially. For one thing, he fears the competition of other men's possible interest in her, and her interest in them. For another thing, he just doesn't want her to enjoy life at his expense, if his person leaves her cold.

Unfortunately inasmuch as she doesn't love him (sexually, I take it) he is going the wrong way about remedying this deficit in the marriage. What he should do, obviously, is be a good character in his own right in the relationship and win her heart with kindness, forging a bond of companionship to nourish the alliance and quicken her regard for him.

How tragic, in the circumstances, that he is making a bad matter worse and damaging her health by his negative behavior. A better man, however disappointed in his wife's lack of ardor, would treat her decently, nonetheless, in terms of affording her normal social privileges, suited to their budget.

It well may be that Leah should leave her husband in self defense. And yet on the other hand, given professional guidance in the light of all the facts, she might learn to lead, deftly, in redeeming the marriage and making a tolerable partnership of it. So my advice to both of you is: Review the problem with a Family Service Agency case worker or a Salvation Army home counsellor.

HONEY FLAVOR TREATS

LET'S EAT

Honey Enhances Flavor Of Many French Dishes

BY IDA BAILEY ALLEN

"HONEY is gathered in all regions of France, the type based on the flowers, shrubs, or trees from which the bees gather nectar," remarked our enthusiastic luncheon host, Mr. Andre Prost, leading importer and authority on honey.

He went on to say:

"The French acacia honey is delicate of taste, the hearty-flavored honey from the Vosges Mountain pines is wonderfully rich. And the rosemary honey from the region around Narbonne in Languedoc has been famous for centuries.

FRAGRANT AND CREAMY

"Flowering herbs in sunny Provence yield fragrant honey, such as the sweet, creamy lavendar honey.

"French honey has a color spectrum of its own, from the pale yellow honey produced from flowers such as linden and clover to the dark reddish-brown fir tree honey.

HONEY FLAVOR TREATS

"Every honey has its own flavor," he added; "each has the potential to blend with or accent the flavor of other food. To find which goes with which could well become a new taste-testing game for gourmets!"

Measurements level; recipes for 6

UPSIDE-DOWN CUSTARDS

2 eggs
1-3 cup sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon pure vanilla extract
2-cups milk
6 tablespoons strained French honey

Beat eggs light. Add sugar, salt, vanilla extract and ¼ cup of the milk. Mix well.

Scald remaining milk and stir into mixture.

Pour 1 tablespoon of honey into bottom of each of 6 (5-oz.) custard cups. Ladle in milk custard. Place in pan of hot water.

Bake 1 hour in moderate oven 350 degrees F., or until knife, inserted in center, comes out clean. Cool.

To serve, turn upside - down into dessert dishes.

Honey provides both glaze and sauce.

The following salad is really a fruit cocktail or fruit cup assembly, for a true fruit salad calls for no salad oil or mayonnaise. Consequently, the dressing is made of fresh lime juice and honey, which is sparingly added to a fruit cocktail (first course); more generously added to a fruit cup (dessert); or used very generously for the fruit salad served on salad greens.

The salad may be the main course at a ladies' luncheon with finger sandwiches topped with thin slices of cheese or chicken meat. Or present (without sandwiches) as the finale of a dinner, when it combines both salad course and dessert. No accompaniment is needed.
