

right its nature, throws him back there is no saying how long, and the claim he might fancy he had, according to the rule now laid down, becomes altogether forfeited.

There are those in England who conceive that transportation is a state of ease and advantage. Let them but reside in Van Dieman's and for one twelve months and their opinions will be changed. In it, as in all other conditions of life, those who behave well are better off, in many respects, than others who show no signs of reformation; and God forbid it should ever be otherwise! but even these have daily reason to find that their degree of punishment is ample.—Van Dieman's Land Almanac.
