A BRAVE GIRL.

"WHAT? Go out to service? My dear child, are you beside yourself? Have you no pride?"

"No need to draw hair-splitting distinctions, auntie. If I engaged as a music teacher, wouldn't you call that going out to service?"

"Yes—that is—I should call it obtaining a situation. But a chambermaid! A nurse! The idea is positively shocking!"

"My dear aunt, I am neither afraid nor ashamed to do what I am best fitted to do. I cannot teach music; and if I could, the field is full, at starvation prices, to say nothing of the merciless din into sensitive ears all day long. Look at Mildred. When night comes she is not fit for anything but a restless sleep of nightmare crochets and quavers. No; art is well enough for those who have a calling that way. I haven't."

"But your lovely stories! They—"

"Are in the publisher's hands, and I must bide my time. If I could live upon pleasant fancies, I might wait till their merit is decided upon. But I must keep the wolf from the door. I will not be dependent upon my mother. She must take care of the others. If my friends oppose me I shall be sorry; but nothing else is left for me."

"If you would only be content to wait. Or if you could get sewing to do—"

"Sewing! Break my back, cramp my fingers and blind my eyes! No, I cannot sew; but I can clean up a room and make a parlor tidy without smashing the bric-a-bac; I can take care of little children, for I dearly love them. I shall not degrade myself nor my friends. There must be families where I can obtain a refined home, and the kind of work that preserves both health and temper. I prefer to be a nursery governess, and this is what I shall apply for; but if I fail, then I shall not be too proud to take the other position."

"Why don't you answer some advertisement?" inquired the aunt.

"I have written up at least a quire of paper in this way. And as to car fare, I have squandered four dollars these two weeks in running from place to place, only to find myself not too respectfully declined."

"Well, there's the Young Women's Christian Association. What are they good for, if not to find employment for such as you,—a refined educated girl?"

"Pooh, pooh, auntie, still on your F. F. V. hobby! Refined paupers are only too plentiful. One thing is sure—if there is any evidence of good birth in me, it is the desire to achieve something myself; not to be a drone simply because the things I cannot do are out of my reach, and those I can do seem beneath me. I have tried all avenues. My name is on the books of the Y. W. C. A. They received me with much courtesy, and will no doubt do all they can; but meanwhile I prefer not to starve. I cannot starve."

"Those publishers! Why can't they tell you whether they will take your stories, or not? They must know."

"Ah, auntie, the mills of the press grind slowly, and not always wonderous sure for unknown writers. I have no doubt of ultimate success. Till that happy day dawns, I must do what my hand findeth me to do."

"Can't you do type-writing, or stenography? Anything but menial service."

"I have not the $5 to pay for lessons on the type writer. I have no money to buy an instrument, and no outside influence to ensure employment. Still less can I undertake stenography. That of itself is a profession. You know how faithfully I tried teaching at the Orphan Asylum. I wanted occupation that would bring me in at least a decent living but which would leave me free to write evenings. There the labor was so hard, and my nerves were so unstrung, that when evening came I could do nothing but rest. If I can only get a home such as I wish, my literary work need not be entirely sacrificed. I want a temporary home till my pet career can be fairly started."

"Well, can you not find odd jobs to do for the newspapers and magazines, as Mrs. Clinton did? You know she came to New York a stranger, visited the publishers, and got as much work as she could do."

"That was a chance in a thousand, auntie. Mrs. Clinton has energy and push beyond ordinary. She reminds me of the lucky person who trips up the stairs of the Brooklyn Bridge at the very last moment, and quietly makes a bee line for the choice seat in the car, when a hundred others who have been jostling and crowding for ten minutes are left in the lurch. She has done just that. She managed to fill in the only gap there was at the time. With my Southern training, you know how hard it is to go among strangers, to venture in those busy offices where an intruder is so unwelcome. I could never do it; I confess I have not the courage.

"I see you are determined, child, I would save you from such a fate if I could."

"Don't worry, auntie dear; I shall come out all right. Only let me get a start. It would not be right to depend upon you when I work my own way, even if you could take care of me. Only consent to recognize your poor relation when she has an evening out. That is all I shall ask."

Thus Nettie Cabell, the educated daughter of the once wealthy Southern family, forgot the would be aristrocratic exactions of "blue blood" and went bravely to work in the despised line of domestic service. With one of her last precious half dollars she advertised for a place as nurse governess, where the duties are more menial than those of the mere teacher.

In due course an answer came that seemed the right one. Two children to be cared for, whose parents were rich in this world's goods. The little girl, a blooming specimen of indulged childhood; the boy a very delicate child, lame since his third year.

The mother fully appreciated Nettie's story, and, ere long, began to realize she had a treasure.

When a handsome sum was paid over by her publishers for two of her novels, her friends urged her to stop her masquerading and come to them. But Nettie Cabell was made of better stuff than selfish aims, and her heart went out to the boy who now clung to her with a child's grateful devotion. She would not desert him.

An arrangement was made by which she could employ a portion of each day in literary work. A separate governess was engaged for the little girl, and Nettie had no cause to regret the step she had taken. Eventually there were substantial advantages growing out of her courageous undertaking, but from the first she was in the full reward of a good conscience.

This is no fancy sketch, but the literal experience of one of the noble army of feminine bread-winners. What one American girl has done others can do. So long as all strive for the higher positions, so long will there be this jostling of the multitude. True merit does not always find its level, where there is such stirring and able competition.

The old peaceful Quaker idea of leveling society worked well. It was truly "help" on all sides—equal deserts and equal awards.

Just as the pampered Southerner of the slavery era is learning to renounce the code that forbade all kinds of work for "ladies"—that filled the homes of struggling brothers and uncles with dependant sisters and nieces left without means of support—so should Northern girls overcome the prejudice against housework. It is a healthful and happy life, full of cheerful routine that does not require the constant supervising public life of the shop girl, and it permits intervals of rest to which she is a stranger. There may be annoyances attending it, but what calling is free from trials, often wearisome and bitter?

If you are called to a special line of toil, and you are conscious of its promptings, prepare yourself thoroughly for that branch and seek your chosen work from place to place till you find it.

But if you are an ordinary mortal, without talents or "calling," be satisfied with the modest place, and act well the part where honor lies. Doubtless many will agree with me, but lack the moral courage to make a start. Confer with your girl friends, and form a "housemaid syndicate." Just a little moral courage, and the rest will be easy.

At the State Fair in St. Louis the Planters' Hotel was crowded with wealthy Southerners, to whom the idea of going to the fair ground in a dirty street-car was utterly repulsive. It was beneath their self-respect to ride in anything but a carriage. The hackmen grew more and more extortionate in their prices, till mutterings, silent but deep, began to be heard.

At length $10 for one family, or one load, was the charge. Southern pride paid it. One gentleman, liberal and generous, and proud as well, made up his mind that he would not be imposed upon. He called a council in the grand saloon and said:

"Gentlemen, we must put this thing down. It is all folly. Those men know what they are doing. They know with whom they have to deal. Let's charter a street car and put a stop to such exorbitant demands."

With one accord they fell in with the plan, only too glad that some one had taken the start.

Courage, then, girls. It is not what you do, but what you are, and how you do it, that is to be considered.

Indiscriminate Arrests.

The London Daily Telegraph published, a few days ago, two sketch portraits from descriptions of the man last seen in the company of the woman named Stride, one of the victims of the Whitechapel murder fiend. The result has been the unceremonious arrest of every man bearing any resemblance to the pictures, and a great deal of discomfort has been caused by this new phase of police activity. Many of the arrests are made by self-constituted detectives or ambitious vigilance committees. The victims are generally discharged from custody as soon as brought before a magistrate, but some are unlucky enough not to be able to satisfy the officials of the circuit and are subjected to more or less annoying detention. One of the men arrested carried a bag, in which was found a razor. This suspect is still held, and will have to give a good account of himself and his razor. Another perplexity attending the Whitechapel muddle is due to the fact that the regular police do not know by sight the various amateur detectives, and the latter are occasionally "held up" and put to the embarrassment of explaining their presence and mysterious movements in the much watched district.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used when children are cutting teeth. It relieves the little sufferer at once; it produces natural quiet sleep by relieving the child from pain; and the little cherub awakes as "bright as a button." It is very pleasant to taste. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, relieves wind, regulates the bowels, and is the best known remedy for diarrhœa, whether arising from teething or other causes. Twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup, and take no other kind. [April 1 '88
