Jottings From a Journal;

—OR—
Four Weeks on the Continent of Europe in the Month of September, 1878.

FOURTH LETTER

DEAR —, We left Lucerne with reluctance, for it is a lovely place. Arrived in Zurich about 6 p. m. Stayed there long enough to partake of the "cup that cheers but not inebriates." Had a pleasant little walk in Zurich. Took the train again to Schaffhausen, arriving there at nine at night. Got into an omnibus and drove to the Schweizerhof Hotel in New Hausen, overlooking the "Falls of the Rhine." Secured rooms from which we could obtain a fine view, and were lulled to sleep by the roar of the cataract. The "Falls of the Rhine" are not nearly so grand as those of Niagara; but they are the finest in Europe, and have a picturesque beauty of their own. They are precipitated in three leaps over a ridge, and are divided by four limestone rocks before they make their final plunge. The best view of the Falls is from the Schloss (or castle) Laufen side. You can go over the bridge to the castle, where there is a great variety of beautifully-carved ivory and bone ornaments for sale. Descending by a foot-path through the woods, a little pavilion is reached, projecting over the abyss. The great rush of water descends with a noise like thunder, and the spray is dashed in all directions. We crossed over the river in a little boat, just below the Falls, which took us to the hotel. The grounds are very prettily laid out, affording many pleasant walks and resting places, in pretty little arbors. Schaffhausen (about two miles from the Falls) is a very quaint town. Most of the houses have oriel windows, elaborately carved. Some of the oldest houses are frescoed all over the front, subjects taken from some old story or legend. The Cathedral was formerly an Abbey Church; it is very massive, and was completed in 1453.

From New Hausen we took the train passing through the Black Forest. At first we were disappointed. The trees seemed smaller than we should find in an American forest; but gradually our murmurs of disapprobation died away, and our enjoyment of the beautiful scenery found vent in words of admiration. The road "winds in and out and round about" on the sides or tops of sloping hills, affording delicious glimpses of valleys and chalets and streams running like silver threads. Now we plunge into a tunnel in total darkness; out again into the bright sunlight; in again—until we have passed through 36 tunnels, the whole route being one continued succession of surprises, until we arrive at Baden-Baden. This celebrated watering place is divided into two parts, the old and the new town. In the old quarter we find some interesting relics of antiquity: remains of Roman baths or therms. These baths are now built over and the water conveyed by pipes to the Trinkhalle, and other establishments. The waters are used for bathing as well as for drinking. They are hot and have a slightly disagreeable taste. One does not long for a repetition of the first dose. They are efficacious in gout, rheumatism and other complaints.

The Stiftskirche, an Abbey Church, was erected in the 7th century, destroyed by fire and restored in the original style in 1866. It contains the mausoleums of several Margraves and some modern stained glass.

The new castle, which commands the town, has been called new ever since the 15th century, to distinguish it from the old castle, which was not then in ruins. The Grand Duke not being in residence, the Castellans took us through the building. It contains galleries of portraits of all the sovereigns who have reigned in Baden, from Christopher the I., in the 15th century, to the present time. The private apartments of the Grand Duke and Duchess are plainly but handsomely fitted up, the floors not carpeted, but inlaid with woods, a kind of parquette style, and polished.

While examining some stained glass in a bow window, our conductor touched a little spot on the wall. Instantly the floor opened disclosing a staircase. The effect was like magic. It reminded us of stories like "Aladdin and his wonderful lamp." It seemed so funny that we, prosaic beings of the 19th Century, should be safely descending staircases that were once wrapped up in darkness and mystery. One little passage we were shown into was surrounded with mirrors, ceiling and sides; such a tiresome yet laughable repetition and reflection of self on head and on foot. The most curious portion of this castle is under ground, where there are numerous dark and gloomy vaults, each with its own dismal story. There is the Judgment Hall, where sentences were passed, a vaulted chamber with stone seats round the sides. Near it is a passage through which the condemned had to pass. Tradition says that the unhappy creature was told that he would soon be free; but that he must "stop and give thanks to the Mother of the Saviour and touch her sacred image with his lips." As soon as the figure was touched a number of knives flew out and cut the victim to pieces. The body was thrown through a trap door into the abyss below. How true or how false this may be I cannot say; but the niche in the wall where the Virgin stood, the trap door and the abyss are veritable facts which we ourselves saw. Before leaving the castle the castellan took us into the garden, presented the ladies of the party with sprigs of myrtle,—to be kept in remembrance of the place,—and showed us Dagobert's Tower, from which we had a fine view of the Old Castle. Returning to our hotel (the Victoria), in the new part of the town, we obtained a horse and carriage and started for a visit to the Old Castle. The road is good and pleasantly shaded with acacias. As you ascend the hill the shade becomes deeper, and there are seats placed under the trees for the weary to rest on. The ruined castle dates from the 10th century. Although apparently crumbling to decay, you can fearlessly ascend to the very top of the edifice—counting yourself well paid for your trouble by the magnificent views you get every step of the way. Spread before you are towns, country, smiling plains, mountains, thread-like rivers, and the tops of the tall pines waving like an ocean of green at your feet. The ruins cover a large space of ground, and prove that at one time the castle must have been a place of great importance. In one of the old ruined windows, an Aolian harp was sighted. Its sweet plaintive sounds seemed like a requiem for the departed glory of the beautiful though crumbling old fortress. The pleasure grounds lining one side of the Vos are shaded with handsome trees. The Trinkhalle has in the front 16 Corinthian columns. Numbers of people resort to it every morning to hear the band play and get their drink of hot water.

The Conversationhaus though unpretending in its appearance outside, boasts some splendid saloons inside fitted up in the most elegant and sumptuous style. It was in this building that the famous "Rouge et Noir" tables were held; but now the practice is put down by the stern arm of the law. Baden is the most frequented and fashionable bathing place in Europe. No less than 50,000 people annually visit it.

Leaving Baden-Baden by rail we passed through Mannheim, Ludwigshafen, etc., arriving at Mayence in the evening. Went next morning to have a peep at the Cathedral. Its erection was begun in 978. In 1009 it was burned down. It was re-erected and burned down again. Four times did this venerable pile rise and four times did the flames devour it. It was severely injured once by lightning, and in 1793 it was damaged during the Siege; but after each catastrophe it was re-erected on a grander scale than before. The market in front of the Cathedral and some mean looking houses very near it are derogatory to the dignity of the imposing old church.

The statue of Gutenberg, the inventor of printing, designed by Thorvaldsen, stands in the Gutenberg Platz.

Left Mayence at 9 a. m., and took boat down the Rhine. The most beautiful part of the river is between Mayence and Bonn. Vine covered hills rise on the banks, and each turn of the river brings in sight old castles standing out grim and defiant on all the boldest headlands. Their name is legion. Little villages are constantly in sight, and the whole route is teeming with historical and legendary lore. The colour of the Rhine is thick and muddy (you know it has been irreverently called the "ditch of Europe") and the grape vines on the banks have anything but an imposing appearance. The soil is terraced all the way up the steep
