The Strike at the Capes.

CAPE TOWN, Feb. 6. The following correspondence took place in presence of T. C. James, Superintendent of the Cape Telegraph Company, and several others...

CAPE TOWN, Feb. 6. To Postmaster, Charlottetown: Men here striking. Strikers making trouble with others, and preventing carriage of mails. Men have policeman with authority to prevent trouble. Reply. (Signed) IRVING & MUTTART.

This is the reply: "To Irving and Muttart. I have nothing to do with your men. You have given security for safety of mails and performance of contract. If any danger or failure will notify your bondsmen of their responsibility." "A. A. MACDONALD, Assistant Inspector."

Thomas Howatt is said and known to be the ringleader. He has made threats, also others of his banditti.

Mr. Editor, in a case of this kind are your bondsmen liable or not? Trifling and insignificant as the Inspector looks on this mail and passenger service, it seems to us that it is entitled to more notice than he appears inclined to give it. The matter has taken a serious aspect. IRVING & MUTTART.

News from India—Insurrection Among Hill Tribes.

LONDON, Feb. 5. Advertis from India state that the Bhil Tribes have risen in insurrection; and have plundered several towns.

The Bhil Tribes chiefly inhabit the rocky ranges of the Vindhya and Satpura mountains, and the banks of the Nerbada, and the Tapi. In common with other hill tribes, the Bhils are supposed to have been aborigines of India, and to have been driven to their present fastnesses at the time of the Hindu invasion. They are of dark complexion, and diminutive stature, but active and capable of enduring great fatigue. Various efforts have been made by the British Government to reclaim this people from their predatory habits, and in 1820 the official report stated that "the Bhils of Mumpur, are becoming reconciled to the life of cultivators though not yet willing to take leases." The British Government has an Agency among the Bhil Tribes which has jurisdiction over 8,160 square miles and 240,000 people. In 1825 (the year the Bhil Agency was framed) a Bhil force was organized with a view of utilizing the warlike instincts of the Bhil Tribes.]

The Dublin papers state that an English solicitor has arrived at Kingstown in search of a missing young lady, who, by the death of her father, a baronet, has become heiress to a fortune of $10,000 per annum. Different accounts are given of the circumstances. One story is to the effect that the lady was residing in Kingstown some years ago and suddenly disappeared, her whereabouts since not being known. Another statement is that the young lady when a babe was left at the door of a charity institution by her parents, who came over from England, the father having married beneath his station, and that the search is now being instituted for her by the widowed mother.

It is reported that a spike maker at Troy, N. Y. who is the seventh son of a seventh son, is so steady in demand by sick people, who believe that he is a born healer of diseases, that he has been obliged to abandon the nail factory and devote himself to his patients, and that a baseball player, who is also seventh son of a seventh son, is going to start on a healing expedition. How the accident of being born seventh in a line of sons can enable a man to scatter health broadcast is something that professors in medical colleges have never yet explained, but should the system prove satisfactory in practice no explanation will be necessary. To be healed merely by talking with a man who had half a dozen brothers, born before him is much easier than going through a course of physic and being subject to the blunders of careless prescription clerks. If some seventh son will do some trifling thing, like extirpating a cancer or restoring a defective eye, just to show his genuineness, he will find business enough to make him eternally bless his birthday.

The breach of promise case in which Mr. Halliday Kingsley, thirty-six, London, a gentleman in the medical profession, claimed £2,000 damages from Miss Eliza Anne Peile, of Dublin, for not marrying him as she had promised, has been concluded before Mr. Justice O'Brien, in Dublin. The plaintiff admitted that for some years he assumed the name of Stanley to escape from his creditors. The defendant's counsel contended that the plaintiff was a designing, heartless fellow, and the lady had a marvellous escape from him. The jury, on the first count, that a promise of marriage had been made, found for the plaintiff. They also found for the plaintiff on the second count that the promise had not been rescinded. They awarded damages of one farthing. They found for the defendant on the count that the promise had been obtained by fraudulent representations. They also found for the defendant on the counter-claim for money lent, with £100 damages. The judge accordingly gave judgment for the defendant, with costs.
