"That is more then I know. It must have happened when I was very young. I did not always live with father Barteau; for I remember riding in the lap of my own father, while it was snowing. I have my father's picture. No one ever told me that it was his picture; but I know it is."

"Good God! What is this that you are telling me!" exclaimed Madame Labardie. "You say that you were lost in the snow, and that you have your father's picture? Show me that picture, child? Be quick?"

The girl drew from her bosom a small gold locket, that was fastened by a leather thong about her neck. Jeannette took it and hastily opened it, disclosing the well-remembered features of her dead husband, Henri Labardie! She clasped the girl in her arms, and burst into tears.

"How wonderfull are the ways of Providence!" she exclaimed between her sobs. "God be thanked, who has sent me into the wilderness to find my child; Annette, you are my own lost little girl! Henri, this is your sister Annette, who was dead, and is alive! Oh, God! thy judgments are just, and thy chastisments are merciful!"

We must pass over the long and earnest conversation that ensued, and can only say that the cooking of the antelope meat was neglected, and that Henri was the only one who did any thing like justice to the repast.

"It is growing late, mother, and something must be done," said Annette at last. "As you are unwilling to go back to the fort, and are afraid to venture among the Blackfeet, you must have a hiding-place for the present. Follow me, and I will take you to a spot where neither white nor red men can find you."

Madame Labardie gladly arose, and, with Henri, followed Annette up into the hills. All three were well loaded with choice portions of the antelope, intended to be kept for future use.

CHAPTER XI.

THE WORST AND BEST OF THE JOKE.

George Searle's slumbers, after the visit of Jean Barteau, were as badly "mixed" as the state of his affairs. The Indians brought him in some supper and a blanket, and he ate the supper and lay down on the blanket; but he was wakeful and uneasy. When he did sleep, his dreams were filled with visions of painted savages dancing around a burning victim, covetous and barbarous old men leading to him troops of blooming daughters, strangely-dressed girls beckoning to him from the tops of inaccessible cliffs, and, among all these appearances, towering over all and frowning at all, the solemn figure of his highly-respectable parent, the Reverend Charles Fauquier Searle.

"Really," said the young gentleman, when he arose and rubbed his eyes in the morning, "it will be a positive necessity for me to change my boarding-house, if I am troubled with any more such dreams as I had last night. Perhaps the sheets were not properly aired, or the pillows were too hard, or the room is not well ventilated. My aunt Virginia would go into spasms if she knew that I was so poorly accommodated."

By the time the sun was four hours high, he was still more disgusted with his "boarding-house," for he had begun to grow weary of his confinement. The uncertainty of his fate, too, troubled him, and he was both anxious to know what was to be the end of his perplexities, and to see the beautiful creature who had lured him into that dreadful place.

In the latter part of his wish he was gratified. The entrance was darkened a little, and then the cave was suddenly brightened by the appearance of Snow Bird, who flitted in as lightly as if she had been made of air.

She looked more beautiful than ever, Searle thought; but there was a pouting and willful expression lurking about her lips and eyes, that confirmed him in his opinion that she was a difficult subject to deal with. He rose and greeted her joyfully, with his best bow and his most pleasans smile.

"As sunlight to the prisoner in his cell, so are you welcome to me," he said. "You are both light and warmth to me, and I feel that I should fade and die without you."

"You had better save your fine speeches for your Indian judges," replied Annette, with a pout. "They are wasted on me, as I do not pretend to understand them, and do not want to. I have come here on business, and have a little to say."

"Say on. If every word was a dagger, you would be welcome to plunge them into my heart!"

"What nonsense! If you would take my advice, you would stop talking foolishly, and think about saving your scalp."

"Of what use would a scalp be to me when my heart is gone?"

"It might serve to cover your brains, if you have any. I have come here because father Barteau told me to come. He says that I am to marry you, that you are a rich young man, that you have promised to marry me and take me to the States, and that you will support him in ease and comfort during the rest of his life. I have come here to say to you that I don't mean to do any such thing."

"Don't say that just yet, my beauty of the wilderness. Don't be too hasty, I beg of you. I followed you into the mountains because I loved you, and I assure you that I do love you, most truly and sincerely. Suppose you wait a while before speaking so very decidedly."

"I don't believe it. You only promised father Barteau that you would marry me, because you were afraid of being roasted by the Blackfeet if you did not agree to what he said. I will never marry a man who is forced to marry me, and I will never be forced to marry anybody."

"Permit me to observe, my dear child, that I had no thought of marrying you without your free and full consent. I told your grandfather—if that old beaver is your granfather—that I would gladly call you mine if I could win your love, but did not wish to marry you against your will. As for the roasting, that would be unpleasant, I know; but I would not sign away my liberty to save my life."

"It looks very much like a forced business, and it does not suit me. I am too young to marry, and it would not do for one so poor as I am to marry a rich and educated gentleman. Besides, I do not wish to marry any man. I had rather marry a mountain."

"Softly, my dear child. Don't put out the light yet. Let me live a little longer."

"I have said all that I meant on that subject. As you say that I brought you into this trouble, I must try to get you out of it. Be patient, and I will see what I can do."

The girl flitted out of the cave as swiftly as she had entered it, leaving Searle in a rather dismal plight.

Agriculture.

Horses are often injured by their exertion to draw heavy wagons out of miry spots in the road. Spavins are frequently caused in this way. After such exertion, the hoses' legs ought to be hand rubbed for an hour a day, for several days. This is a gentle frixion by the hand up and down the legs. Coarse horses seldom require it, but high-bred ones are much benefited by the operation.

The Workshops.—Every farmer should at leas' have a good work-bench, tolerably supplied wit i carpenters' tools, and to these many may profitably add soldering irons, awls, and needles for mending harness, a rivet set and rivets, paint pots and brushes, and a variety of other tools. There is a great deal of work for rainy and cold days that may be done—like mending and painting farm implements, making bee-hives and honey-boxes, hens' nests, chicken coops, etc.

Field Work.—Animals must be gradually accustomed to hard labor, or their necks and shoulders may gall badly, Where galls or tender spots occur, they should be washed with castile soap and cold water, and covered over night with compresses of wet cloths. As more labor is demanded, increase the feed. Never plow when the ground packs hard from the moisture it contains. Some sandy soils never pack thus, and never bake into clods, but loamy and peaty soils do, and a field is often greatly injured if plowed a day or two too soon, or if worked in any way while wet.

Fences.—Before the ground settles after the coming out of the frost, and while it is yet too wet to plow, embrace the opportunity to reset old fences, and put up new ones. Try the posts, and strengthen weak ones by stakes driven along side; replace rotten rails with strong ones.

Getting out Manure.—This is work for frosty mornings, as the wheels and teams would cut up the land badly at other times; or it should be delayed until the ground is somewhat dry.

NORWAY OATS.—Several inquirers.—As a finality we would say that we have grown an oat called Norway, and found it a good and productive grain. The position of this journal in regard to snch matters is this: If we believe that those who advertise "noveltics" are acting in good faith, we admit their advertisements. We do not endorse the representations made concerning the articles; nor do we admit the advertisement if we have reason to suppose that there is any "humbug" about it. Moreover, we advise no one to invest in new and untried things, unless he can afford to lose his money in case of failure. Please remember that all new plants, seeds, and the like, are on probation. If one in twenty proves better than any thing of its kind already in cultivation it is a great gain. If we were to exclude all seeds and plants until they had been generally tested and proved valuable all over the country, it would be depriving our readers of opportunities for experiment which they ought to have; indeed, few things would ever get generally tested. That spurious "Norway oats" are in the market we do not doubt. That the "Norway" or any other oat will prove a success everywhere we do not believe. That the "Norway" has been found valuable in Vermont, Nebraska and other States, we are as well assured as we can be of any thing depending upon testimony. Touch all new things gentle, and if a failure is likely to be at all embarrassing let them alone until those who can afford to do so have tried them.—American Agriculturist.

GREASING WAGON WHEELS.—What is the best article for greasing axles, and how often should it be applied?'—Mutton or beef tallow is a good article for wooden axles, and castor oil is, perhaps, the best cheap oil for iron or steel. 'Little and often' is the rule for greasing. Hubs are often injured by too much oil, as it tends to loosen the spokes and boxes. Rancid castor oil can frequently be had very cheap, and it is quite as good as the best for a lubricator. A teaspoonful of oil applied to an axle is just as efficacious as a quart, and would be much cheaper.

STABLING COWS AND HORSES TOGETHER.—'J. S.,' Chippewa, Canada. 'Will the breath of cows be detrimental to horses kept in the same stable?'—It is usual to keep these animals in seperate stables on large farms, more as a matter of convenience than for any other cause. But the multitude of people in villages, who keep bnt one or two horses, and as many cows, quite as generally keep them in adjoining stalls. If the stables are well ventilated and the urine is absorbed by muck or other deodorizers, so that there is no bad odor, the health of neither will suffer from the companionship. There is, perhaps, no foundation for the popular opinion that the breath of cows is wholesome for consumptives. Any pure air like that of a well-ventilated stable is much better for them than the close, hot, dry rooms invalids usually occupy.

MANURING TREES.—It is not too late to do this work if it was neglected last fall, for the mannre can be spread about the trees and the frequent spring rains will carry down its good qualities into the soil, where the little roots will find it. We regard this top-dressing about trees as very good, when done at the proper season, and then when the dry weather comes on, let the manure be lightly ploughed or dug under.

Grand Diet of Worms,

DISSOLVED BY

WATSON'S SCHOLEDION,

WHICH is offered to the public as a perfectly safe, pleasant and efficacious expeller of Worms from the human system. As this preparation contains no mineral ingredient, the administration of it to young children is not followed by the dangerous and, in many cases, fatal consequences resulting from the use of many of the Vermifuges at present before the public.

A compliance with the directions accompanying it will prove it deserves the character claimed for it above, while the promptness and painless character of its action render it the cheapest and safest remedy for worms hitherto discovered.
