TASS TAKES SHARP SWIPE AT U.S. FOR EXPORT OFFER

MOSCOW (AP) — The official Soviet news agency Tass took a sarcastic swipe at the United States Monday for offering unlicensed exports to the Soviet Union of raw cotton, rags, pigeon feed and chewing gum.

Tass said the U.S. is guided by special rules in trading with Russia and divides U.S. commodities into three groups: those banned for export, a second comprising commodities which the U.S. will sell freely but which the Russians will not buy.

Referring to the last group, Tass correspondent Valentin Vasiliev wrote: "What does the United States—a big industrial power—want to do with its surplus of raw cotton, rags, pigeon feed and chewing gum?"

"Perhaps," Tass said, "the trade of goods for unrestricted trade will be increased by adding last year's snow or the holes from doughnuts."

"There is a list, 26 pages of compact printed text, drawn up with amazing circumstances. For instance, American manufacturers are allowed freely to sell to the Soviet Union rags, cuts from pieces of waste and new, old and second-hand civilian clothing."

"The United States does not place any obstacles on the sale of rat poison. This is a reference to the theory on the strategic goods list. "Chewing gum is also strategic."

The Tass commentary concluded by saying it would be interesting to know what proposals the U.S. will prepare for the forthcoming world trade conference.
