ELLEN'S DIARY

The Careful Car-Driver Is Admired At Alderlea

"Perhaps this wouldn't be a bad time to fire those heaps of brush" the younger farmer suggested to his father, during a lull in the choring this afternoon. James stopped there in the yard to take stock of the wind.

"I'd say" he offered "we could not find better."

Mack just home from school smiled happily at this unexpected windfall of pleasure. "I'd say the wind is in the exact quarter we want it. Well, what's keeping us?" he questioned.

James made no reply. He was watching the progress of a passing car, the driver obviously a careful fellow, pleased to keep his machine under good control, speed neither excessive nor slow, but steady, as keeping to his own side of the road he followed the bend of way which slips by lane's end.

"If everyone drove like that" James nodded approvingly "there would be very few accidents on Island roads."

"No children killed or hurt" we added.

"Or adults either" the younger farmer said "or sent to hospital."

". . to carry their scars and disabilities for the rest of their lives" we supplied.

"To say nothing of the cars smashed" James commented, turning away to join in the preparations for burning the heaps of brush waiting since the last wood-cutting over the fields in the woodlands.

The day was cloudy then, yesterday's sun and frost and wind having given place to a day mild and pensive and gray. With an autumn touch, it put a smokey haze on the far-away hills. Nearest against the bare maples, we saw the flames of the burning gleam brightly, the smokes lift and rise in dark plumes that toppled soon to earth in a manner which belongs with the damp air of the days of the fall.

"There's nothing left of those heaps but ashes. It's all tidy now for us there when we come to cut wood" Mack brought in the tidings before supper, fair face darkened and streaked with the smoke and exertion.

We were then making ready a last pumpkin for preserve, paring and cubing the creamy strips to a pan. When done we would add the requirement of sugar and allow the mixture to stand over night. In the morning we would draw of the accumulated syrup, and adding diced lemons and a piece of root ginger simmer the liquid down to that moment when we should put in the pumpkin and cook until all had reached the consistently of marmalade.

"Did you remember to save seeds?" Mack asked. "Because there'll be another Hallowe'en" he smiled. "There'll be Christmas and other special days first but, he nodded with a chuckle "it'll come!"

But it is quiet we are at this house at present, with only the cat's purr and a little fall wind complaining at the windows for our company. For James is awa'. Gone not "over the sea to Skye" but along the field-paths to Rob's.

Until tomorrow — — — Diary — Goodnight. . . . .
