CHAPTER XXVIII.

'Nay, sir,' Adam said in a calmer voice, as if he were half relieved—for he was too straightforward to make a distinction between a direct falsehood and an indirect one—'Nay, sir, things don't lie between Hetty and you. You're acting with your eyes open, whatever you may do; but how do you know what's been in her mind? She's all but a child—as any man with a conscience in him ought to feel bound to take care on. And whatever you may think, I know she's been fixing her heart on you; for there's a many things clear to me now as I didn't understand before. But you seem to make light o' what she may feel—you don't think o' that.

'Good God, Adam, let me alone!' Arthur burst out impetuously; 'I feel it enough without your worrying me.'

He was aware of his indiscretion as soon as the words had escaped him.

'Well, then, if you feel it,' Adam rejoined eagerly; 'if you feel as you may ha' put false notions into her mind, and made her believe as you loved her, when all the while you meant nothing, I've this demand to make of you—I'm not speaking for myself, but for her. I ask you t' undeceive her before you go away. Y'aren't going away forever; and, if you leave her behind with a notion in her head o' your feeling about her the same as she feels about you, she'll be hankering after you, and the mischief may get worse. It may be a smart to her now, but it'll save her pain i' th' end. I ask you to write a letter—you may trust to my seeing as she gets it; tell her the truth, and take blame to yourself for behaving as you'd no right to do to a young woman, as isn't your equal. I speak plain, sir. But I can't speak any other way. There's nobody can take care o' Hetty in this thing but me.'

'I can do what I think needful in the matter,' said Arthur, more and more irritated by mingled distress and perplexity, 'without giving promises to you. I shall take what measures I think proper.'

'No,' said Adam, in an abrupt decided tone, 'that won't do. I must know what ground I'm treading on. I must be safe as you've put an end to what ought never ha' been begun. I don't forget what's owing to you as a gentleman; but in this thing we're man and man, and I can't give up.'

There was no answer for some moments. Then Arthur said, 'I'll see you to-morrow. I can bear no more now; I'm ill.' He rose as he spoke, and reached his cap, as if intending to go.

'You won't see her again!' Adam exclaimed, with a flash of recurring anger and suspicion, moving toward the door and placing his back against it. 'Either tell me she can never be my wife—tell me you've been lying—or else promise me what I've said.'

Adam, uttering his alternative, stood like a terrible fate before Arthur, who had moved forward a step or two, and now stopped, faint, shaken, sick in mind and body. It seemed long to both of them—that inward struggle of Arthur's before he said feebly, 'I promise you; let me go.'

Adam moved away from the door and opened it, but when Arthur reached the step he stopped again and leaned against the door-post.'

'You're not well enough to walk alone, sir,' said Adam. 'Take my arm again.'

Arthur made no answer, and presently walked on, Adam following. But after a few steps he stood still again, and said coldly. 'I believe I must trouble you. Its getting late now, and there may be an alarm set up about me at home.'

Adam gave his arm, and they walked on without uttering a word, till they came where the basket and the tools lay.

'I must pick up the tools, sir,' Adam said. 'They're my brother's. I doubt they'll be rusted. If you'll please to wait a minute.'

Arthur stood still without speaking, and no other word passed between them till they were at the side entrance, where he hoped to get in without being seen by any one. He said then, 'Thank you; I needn't trouble you any farther.'

'What time will it be convenient for me to see you to-morrow, sir?'

'You may send me word that you're here at five o'clock,' said Arthur; 'not before.'

'Good-night, sir,' said Adam. But he heard no reply. Arthur had turned into the house.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE NEXT MORNING.

Arthur did not pass a sleepless night; he slept long and well; for sleep comes to the perplexed—if the perplexed are only weary enough. But at seven he rang his bell and astonished Pym by declaring that he was going to get up, and must have breakfast brought to him at eight.

'And see that my mare is saddled at half-past eight, and tell my grandfather when he's down that I'm better this morning, and am gone for a ride.'

He had been awake an hour, and could rest in bed no longer. In bed our yesterdays are too oppressive; if a man can only get up, though it be but to whistle or to smoke, he has a present which offers some resistance to the past—sensations which assert themselves against tyrannous memories. And if there were such a thing as taking averages of feeling, it would certainly be found that in the shooting and hunting seasons, regrets, self-reproach, and mortified pride, weigh lighter on country gentlemen than in late spring and summer. Arthur felt that he should be more of a man on horseback. Even the presence of Pym, waiting on him with the usual deference, was a reassurance to him of the scenes of yesterday; for, with Arthur's sensitiveness to opinion, the loss of Adam's respect was a shock to his self-contentment which suffused his imagination with the sense that he had sunk in all eyes; as a sudden shock of fear from some real peril makes a nervous woman afraid even to step, because all her perceptions are suffused with a sense of danger.

Arthur's, as you know, was a loving nature. Deeds of kindness were as easy to him as a bad habit; they were the common issue of his weakness and good qualities, of his egotism and his sympathy. He didn't like to witness pain, and he liked to have grateful eyes beaming on him as the giver of pleasure. When he was a lad of seven he one day kicked down an old gardener's pitcher of broth, from no motive but a kicking impulse, not reflecting that it was the old man's dinner; but on learning that sad fact, he took his favorite pencil-case and a silver-hafted knife out of his pocket and offered them as compensation. He had been the same Arthur ever since, trying to make all offenses forgotten in benefits. If there were any bitterness in his nature, it could only show itself against the man who refused to be conciliated by him. And perhaps the time was come for some of that bitterness to rise. At the first moment Arthur had left pure distress and self-reproach at discovering that Adam's happiness was involved in his relation to Hetty; if there had been a possibility of making Adam tenfold amends—if deeds of gifts, or any other deeds, would have restored Adam's contentment and regard for him as a benefactor, Arthur would not only have executed them without hesitation, but would have felt bound all the more closely to Adam, and would never have been weary of making retribution. But Adam could receive no amends; his sufferings could not be canceled; his respect and affection could not be recovered by any prompt deeds of atonement.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Average Attendance at Schools.

Sir,—At a general meeting of the ratepayers of Mount Albion District No. 134, held in the Schoolhouse on Feb. 28, it was the unanimous opinion of those present that the average attendance of scholars required to attend our school is quite too high, and your correspondent is of opinion that this grievance is not confined to our particular school, but that throughout the Island generally the same trouble is felt. The law now is that fifty per cent. of the children between the ages of five and sixteen attend school. This may be quite suited to cities, and some well situated districts, but to outlying districts, where many children have to go from one and a half to two miles to school, it is nearly impossible to make the average required by law, and on cold or stormy days children of five and six years, or even older, cannot possibly attend, and in summer farmers are almost compelled to keep some of the older children home, as hired help is becoming so scarce. And while in favor of compulsory education, and in full sympathy with the working of the act generally, and also granting that districts can do better than they now do, yet I believe on this one point some amendment should be made; for after a careful trial we find it nearly impossible to meet the average required, and the Trustees have frequently to levy assessments on many in the district, which they find much difficulty in collecting. I trust that others interested on this point will speak up, and if it is the wish of a majority of the ratepayers throughout the Island that this clause in the act be amended, so as to read "forty or forty-five per cent. attendance," instead of "fifty," as it now reads, we are led to believe that those in authority will at once attend to that wish, and have the act so to read as to better suit all concerned.

The firm of Sinclair, Minto & Stewart has dissolved, Sinclair and Stewart continuing the business and Mr. Minto moving out. We heartily wish the new firm every success.

A gentleman from Clifton informs us that there are about 200 mud-diggers at work on Southwest River, New London. The people in that section appear to be going into the mud-digging business with great vigor.

Hon. John Lefurgey and Mr. Archibald McMillan returned home last Friday; the former from a trip to Europe, returning by New York, the latter from a lengthy visit to the Southern States. They were both cordially welcomed home by citizens in general.

Obituary Notice.—We sympathise with Mr. Alex. Anderson, of Bedeque, and his family on the occasion of death removing a much-loved wife and mother at a comparatively early age. Deceased was a daughter of the late Dugald McCallum, Esq., of Lower Montague, and in every respect was a superior woman. Not only her own family and immediate friends, but the whole community will long continue to miss one who possessed so many excellencies of character. Her funeral (on the 26th) was among the largest ever seen in that section of the country.
