BRICK HOUSE CREEK.

HOW PIRATE TOM JOHNSON AND HIS GHOST MADE IT FAMOUS.

The Adventure of Jaac Spragg, the Daredevil of Hungry Harbor—A Legend of Long Island—The Days When Freebooters Were Honored Citizens.

In those early days when pirating was a trade in which men of standing in the community engaged, either openly or covertly, there were some queer and startling happenings along the south coast of Long Island. More than a century ago the legend of Brick House creek was an heirloom in the vicinity of Babylon. It had come down from generation to generation in company with the story of Doacon Tribulation Smith's conquest of Tackapausha, the Mersapague sachem.

It was in South Jerusalem that Thomas Johnson, more familiarly known as "old Colonel Tom," built the first brick house on Long Island, which was then called Mattowaes. This brick house stood on the best farm on the island, and in subsequent years it came to be regarded with a feeling of awe by the Dutch residents of that region. "Old Colonel Tom" was a man of unquestioned prestige in the community. He enjoyed the respect and homage of his neighbors because he insisted upon it. In the picturesque cove at the mouth of Brick House creek lay a staunch clipper built schooner, carrying a six pounder, a magazine of ammunition and a rack of cutlasses. This clipper built schooner made occasional trips out into the ocean, and its return was invariably followed by neighborly festivities in honor of "old Colonel Tom's" prowess and increasing prosperity. On such occasions the hardy crew of the little schooner would bring out their cutlasses and scour off certain dark spots with more or less ostentation.

There were honest and pious people on the island of Mattowaes in those days, but none was disposed to criticize the doings of his neighbor, especially the doings of such a neighbor as "old Colonel Tom." The trade of "water merchant" was regarded by popular sentiment as leniently as infractions of the excise law are now. In Smith's "History of New York" may be found this paragraph: "It is certain that the pirates were supplied with provisions by the people of Long Island, who for many years afterward were so infatuated with the notion that members of that guild buried great quantities of money along the coast that there is scarce a point of land on the island without the marks of their 'auri sacra fames.' Some credulous people have ruled themselves by these researches, and they propagated a thousand idle fables, current to this day among our country farmers."

The same historian is authority for the statement that "many worthy gentlemen" of that early period invested much property in divers small craft—i. e., brigantines and cutters, wherewith they scoured the sea, paying visits unto other vessels and carrying on a general trade after a very insistent and wholesale fashion. It is a matter of wholesale record that Captain Kidd had for his associates Lord Chancellor Somers, the Duke of Shrewsbury, the earls of Romney and Oxford and other equally illustrious individuals.

Tradition has it that "old Colonel Tom" grew cruel and bloodthirsty, and "the relation of his deeds made people shudder to hear," and when he died the old brick house and Brick House creek seemed to become bewitched. On stormy nights the ghost of the dead pirate held high carnival in the house. The window of his bedroom was always open. No earthly hand could close it. Every Saturday night the waters of Brick House creek emitted sulphurous lights and odors, and if any foolhardy fisherman chanced to hook a fish in that creek on Saturday "there would be a low, rumbling noise, a smell of sulphur, and the fisherman's boat would be cast high and dry on the bank."

Jaac Spragg, the daredevil of Hungry harbor, laid a wager of a quart of rum with Ben Storor that he would go sailing alone in Brick House creek on a certain Saturday night. Jaac's Aunt Chastity endeavored to dissuade him, but he shook her off and said "he'd be hanged if he wouldn't like to come across 'old Colonel Tom.'" Jaac went. His neighbors and his frantic wife searched for him all day and all night Sunday, and it was not until daybreak on Monday that they found him lying unconscious in the bottom of his skiff, which was high and dry on a cliff a mile away.

When he came to himself, Jaac told amid shudders and means of a horrible experience. He had met the ghost of old Colonel Tom and had been taken out to sea on a specter pirate ship. The fiendish ghost had compelled him to slay old people in cold blood and torture and mutilate children. Finally he rebelled at some atrocious command, and the pirate's ghost summoned four devils with wings of blue flame, who threw him into his skiff and bore him to the cliff where he was found.

Jaac Spragg lived for many years in Jerusalem South after that eventful night, and he told his story over and over again, never varying it as to details. His children repeated the narrative, and their children and grandchildren told it after them. Thus was perpetuated the legend of Brick House creek.—New York Times.
