With All My Love

(By Virginia Bowes)

He looked properly embarrassed, and he grinned sheepishly. "I am sorry, really, but I—I had to talk to you—alone." He was a thin boy, good-looking, with clear blue eyes and short, bristly brown hair. He wore a loose-fitting sweat shirt that was marked with grease and a baggy old pair of slacks. He didn't have his glasses on, but you could still see the marks on his nose where they'd rested. Clare was mildly surprised that he made such a decent appearance. She closed up. She'd always thought of him as a sour, bookish-looking person. The fact that he was top man in his class all through school and had graduated from the university with highest honors was all that anyone seemed to know about him. He never mixed with the crowd at the club, nor with any other crowd so far as she knew.

"Hop in," she said. "We'll talk as we drive along. I can't block the highway." He got in awkwardly, unable to conceal his mild astonishment at her willingness to oblige. "There's a little side road up here a way," he said thoughtfully. "It's going to be hard to say what I have to say—would you mind parking here for a few minutes?" Clare pushed her lips, looked at him narrowly for a moment, then grinned. She put the car in gear and started down the road. "I've always wanted to meet one of those mysterious strangers," she said glibly, "but I never thought he'd look like you."

But what he told her took the bluntness out of her tongue and thoroughly deadened her desire to amuse herself for a while at his sober expense. His father and her mother. That was what he talked about. Those were the words that ran over and over again through her mind for weeks afterward. His father and her mother. "Forewarned is forearmed," he said, unconscious of the melodramatic sense of the words. "I want you and your father to know—if he already doesn't—before anything might be done. It may be better for the two of them to see their reputations rather than for both their families to be broken up. My mother would take him back regardless of how he was disgraced, because she loves him that deeply. The danger is that they might decide on divorce and marriage afterward, and bring everything into the open themselves in a way that would protect them. It would be better, I believe, to bring the scandal down around their heads when they are not expecting it; then they might be glad to crawl back into the affections of their own families."

That had been on a Monday, and they'd met again, the same way, each day through Friday. By then they were, all unconsciously, closer friends than either of them had ever had before. They'd both admitted to each other later that after the very first meeting there'd been an anticipation of the meetings that was far keener than was warranted by what they discussed. Already they were in love, but it was weeks before they realized it.

On Friday Clare decided that she'd talk to her father. She knew he was completely unaware of his wife's defection; it was going to be hard to tell him. She'd tell him Saturday evening before she went to the Club dance, when he and his wife would be left alone at the house. He'd have Saturday night and Sunday to think about it, decide what to do. But she never had to tell Stephen Carlidge. He found out about it at the same time everyone in can disclaim his own child and ask you to surrender it. He might be induced to change his mind if you have him, too, talk with the proper person.

DEAR MISS DIX: I am a second-year college student, with a problem. I am in love with a red-headed boy who does not like me to wear red. I have dark hair and wear red very often. Since I am in college I cannot afford to change my wardrobe. He is quite upset and gets angry whenever I have on something red. What should I do? WINIFREDA

ANSWER: Some people have such an antipathy to a certain color that they become actually ill when confronted with it. Your boy's friend's antagonism to red may be as serious a thing, or it may just be a whim. You must judge its relative importance and act accordingly. He probably is sincere in his dislike of red, and if so you had better wear it as little as possible.

DEAR MISS DIX: I am 12 years old and unhappy because some of my girl friends use pink lipstick and my mother doesn't want me to. Is he right or wrong? ANNABELLE happiness in a goodly measure has been the Doctor's portion... wife and home, son and grandchildren to bless him, as well as the deep gratitude and respect of those folks near and far, within the wide extent of his practice. But loved and best-of-wives gone to a "far bourne," he has entered now the lonely westering years.

ANSWER: Like most mothers, yours is absolutely right in this regard. Twelve is too young for even the lightest of pink lipsticks. Your own youthful coloring is enough adornment at your age. Lipstick is a camouflage, and the charm of a young girl has nothing to hide.

Is it true that older people are invariably lonely? Then how does a stout heart meet these years? By the same unswerving devotion to duty that has ever characterized his days and years—the sick and suffering first and always, finding a Balm of Gilead, we doubt not now for mind and heart in the healing of others. As it has been, it will be, a quick smile here, a word of encouragement there and sympathy always. "And how did her finger do?" we overheard this busy man stop to question a wee ringleted girl who apparently must have received treatment at his skillful hands. And the grateful smile of the young mother was answer for us.

And now the week which brought us some of August's first days is nearing its close. A bit austere it goes. Or perhaps we only fancy an edge of chill in the air this evening, forerunner of harvest and Autumn. And what shall we do about August, new month to which we have come? We shall walk confidently into its hours, but just for good luck shall we now wish a wish upon that first star of night which hangs in the west? Better still three wishes "in a one and a two and a three?"

"To have the flavor sound and sweet Of ripening fruit hung high Among cool leaves, where shade and sun In ever-changing patterns run All woven in the sky!"

To keep this vital wholesomeness, This vision burning bright: The whole Ideal undimmed by age. As life proceeds, page after page— Until the final rite.

To have the gift of happiness Above a Hearth, for all to share Spread like two shining wings Who cross the threshold, and who care To hear the song it sings! Until Monday — Diary — Good-night...
