LABOR AND CAPITAL

Mr. Foster's Appeal at Montreal.

At Montreal, Mr. Foster said: Well, sir, the Liberal-Conservatives have but one tune, and that is the tune to the adequate protection of the industries and labor in Canada. It was the same step in 1878, and it was the same step at 1879, only more so, because it was put into the Statute Book. I was the same step down to 1882; it was the same step down to 1887; it was the same step down to 1891, and it was the same step down to 1896; and, sir, we do not change, because we are yet in possession of the same tune in 1900. (Great applause.) I made that statement at Summerside the other night in a packed open air meeting, and one very cute chap remarked, "Oh, but you made adjustments," and I answered, "Yes, of course we did; I don't suppose you are wearing the same clothes as you were when you were two years old. We make our adjustment, but the principle is the same. We always wear clothes, and we wear our own clothes." (Loud applause.) And so I say to you tonight, after hearing these glorious leaders, my veteran chief, and my colleague, Hugh John, is there any doubt in your mind as to what you ought to ask the electorate to do with reference to these great questions upon which the labor and the industries of this country depend so much? Say, business men and men of capital, what do you think? Is it better to have the same steady principle upon the affairs of this country carried out, or is it better or worse that you don't know one year from another upon which principle you will have to stand? Labour without capital would be shorn of its arms and its powers, and just the same with capital if labor were not by its side. What do you think is best for the labor of this country—to have a staid and fixed principle, keeping the idea of Canadian labor for Canadian laborers. Mr. Blair goes over to the United States and buys eight locomotives and they come steaming into the station house here in Montreal. What does that mean? It means that labor, foreign labor, gets the wages for all this work that was done.

What else? Laborers' families in a foreign country are getting life, love and home comforts at the expense of the operators of this country. (Applause.) Every ton of shining steel which, instead of being made out of Canadian ores, in Canadian smelters and moulded by the brawny hands of Canadian labor, every ton of it goes to build up the wealth and power of a foreign country, while it might just as well remain here. (Renewed applause.) By the laws of power which has existed forever and will ever exist, there is an indissoluble bond for all prosperity and better progress between labor and capital. Let capital not lay its heavy hand upon labor and let labor never make the mistake of despising and scorning capital. Each is essential to the other. The brawny hands of labor may stand before these very mountains of the finest ore in the world, and they may stand there and stand there until they starve, until their bones whiten at the base of the mountain, and they cannot extract food nor wealth from it. Let all the capitalists of the city of Montreal stand before that same mountain of iron ore, and stand there until they starve and their bones whiten at the base of the mountain, they cannot alone extract sustenance or wealth out of that ore. But put them together and you see the true solution of the chemical process and the mechanical process invented by some pale student in the laboratory who labors as surely as any laborer in this wide world. (Applause.) Place the brawny arms of labor, the millions of capital and the wonderful process of fluxing together and there you have the sustenance, the wealth the power, for upbuilding the country. (Applause.) That is the true

RELATIONSHIP OF LABOR TO CAPITAL

Why should we not have capital in this country? Twenty years ago you could be excused for not wishing it in this country. Why? Because you did not know what the country had but to-day we live in times of life and knowledge; we know what we have in part, and by the part we know that by the union of the abundance of labor and the abundance of capital there is in this country and the broad and wide and deep resources we have that by which we can build up a nation second to none in any equal area in any part of this broad world. (Loud applause.) Young men, some of you who are before me to-night, maybe, are marching up to that which you first prize, your citizenship. Do you ever think of how absolutely vital that citizenship may be made to good government? Your ballot is your right to self-government; your warrant, your franchise, is the strongest right that you have, and the most inestimable bond that is given to you. It is the badge of your citizenship. When this young nation is being built up, think of the responsibility that is lying upon you, growing up to the fullness of manhood. Exercise your franchise with an intelligence and thoughtfulness which will make in the direct line of good government. Let Liberal-Conservative history do its work of drawing you towards it as a party which embodies at the present time, as in the past, all that is best for the people and the progress of this great Canada of ours.
