could make him leave until he was ready.

"He may stay for days and days," cried Mrs. Hooty.

Hooty nodded. "That is true, too true," said he. "Probably he'll stay all the longer because he thinks we don't want him here."

Now there had come a change. Hooty and Mrs. Hooty still were worried but the worry was a different kind of worry. Yes, sir, it was a different kind of worry, so different that it was worry of a completely opposite kind. Instead of worrying for fear he would stay they were worrying for fear he would go. You see, it no longer was a secret that there were babies up in that big nest. Bobby Coon knew it. Gray Fox knew it. Twice Bobby Coon had tried to climb up to that nest and twice Hooty and Mrs. Hooty had driven him down. This was before Prickly Porky had chosen that tree in which to stay awhile. While he was there Bobby wouldn't even think of trying for a third time.

Gray Fox had looked up in that tree, his mouth watering as he heard the cries of those babies in the nest, had seen Prickly Porky between him and the nest and promptly had changed his mind about going up after those babies. He wasn't afraid of Prickly Porky's teeth and claws. He didn't think that Prickly Porky would even try to fight. He was afraid that in trying to get past the Untouchable One he might brush against some of the little spears called quills hidden in the latter's coat. No dinner, not even one of tender young Birds, was worth the chance of doing this. Not for nothing was Prickly Porky called the Untouchable One.

"I hope he will stay right in this tree until our darlings can fly," declared Mrs. Hooty, glaring down at Gray Fox.

"If he doesn't I don't know what we will do," worried Hooty. Prickly Porky paid no attention to either Gray Fox or the worrying Owls. He minded his own business. He has a way of doing this.

Says CNR Men Did Tremendous Job On Fighting Heavy Storms

MONCTON, N. B., Mar. 24—On a trip to regional headquarters for the purpose of conferring with regional officers and to look over facilities, both with regard to yards and shops, S. F. Dingle, system vice president, operations, of the Canadian National Railways at Montreal, arrived in Moncton over the weekend.

During the course of his inspection, Mr. Dingle visited the Moncton shops, the largest industrial plant in the Maritimes, where he inspected the newly installed facilities for the care, maintenance and repair of diesel equipment, steam power and cars.

In conferring with regional officers, Mr. Dingle was particularly concerned with the position of the railway following the recent severe snow storms that hit the Maritimes and the outlook for the balance of the year. He paid tribute to the tremendous job that officers and men did in keeping up with the traffic which, because of the interruptions occasioned by one of the worst winters ever experienced in the Maritimes, suffered constant delays, and the resulting congestion, he said, has been handled as expeditiously as possible with traffic now moving currently and on a normal basis.
