ELLEN'S DIARY

Wind Stirs Blue Shadows On A Moonlighted Lawn

There is a keening sound in tonight's wind, a little moaning note, as it stirs the blue shadows that are falling patterns of mist across the breast of the snow on the moonlighted lawn. We think it mourns a bit, as it has by day, for mankind: over all our unseemly ways and our shortcomings, for the things we leave undone, for the hatred and jealousy and strife and all their evil ilk, that are incidental to the living in this old and so lovely world.

It is heart-sick too, I think tonight's wind, that blows high and low, over the tragedies that befall, the accidents and happenings that attend while joy issues, the bereavements that come to sadden hearts and homes, and bring the glad Christmaside...

Christmas - the season will have its traffic accidents. And already the year's toll in death and disability has been too high in this little Island Province, where supposedly its folks are a circumspect and leisurely people, content to make haste with caution. It is not unlikely that there will be drownings - some untended small one will venture out on this ice. Fire is not as unusual during the Christmaside. We must, we must be careful, we must have a safe arrangement of lights and a lighting on the indoor tree, keeping a watchful eye to its discarded light as soon as possible, or letting it shine from the lawn where if it should chance to catch fire, it would do little harm.

There's a whistle in tonight's wind, Ellen - a change of weather, it means - James offers from the old armchair.

"It has a sound, sometimes about from some article he would share."

"Did you read this, Ellen?" he will query, sometimes with a chuckle over an amusing item, but more often soberly because of the tragic or the sensational items which after all make the news.
