ELLEN'S DIARY

Afterglow Of The Sun Reflected In A Stream

"I stand you have to do, Ellen. It's all up to the bales - see, like this!" James said when, with Peter and I, this evening, we chanced to arrive at a hayland which was put in order after the spring.

The sun had just smiled and slipped down behind a rim of hills, and the silences of a summer evening that is windless was a spreading over all between that silvered the foot of the field, we could catch glimpses of the afterglow reflected brightly in the stream.

"Do it like this," Mack offered. "I believe" Peter grinned at length, "I'd like to go home to bed. Come on, I begged. You will read to me? I can't sleep unless I'm read to."

"The island is lovely, No summer-dry yet, but all containing to be fresh and green. This is the same 'Verdant Earth', Lorraine Ballantyne knows it can't be wrong. The verdant earth speaks of me. Of simple things and true. Of sunshine shimmering over the hills, White mist in crystal dew. A walk in on a tall pine, The collar on a hill, A straight clean road to follow, An oriole's voice to thrill.

A farmer walking over his field, His good green crops to scan, And under all, the verdant earth That feeds both beast and man.

To every one there comes a time, To sit on soft green sod, And turn one's eye toward the hills, To meet the new strength from God.

Good Monday - Diary - Good night."
