Evening Shadows Bring Workers From The Field

"Then came the labours home from the field and serene night, and twilight prevailed." So aptly we heard these words of Longfellow's, Evangeline, remembered from English lessons absorbed at an old and initiated school-desk of the long ago, described this evening at Alderley.

Home came our workers to the yard—the harvesters that with high poles, had moved smartly into a harvest—field this afternoon. We went that small procession of machines over a far hilltop—an old track to the farmstead, tractor and binder, and the little trucks with the help. Pans of the harvesters, "turning" it came, and pastures tawny with the touch of September on them, and the herd of many cows grazing there.

So the dewfall brought our workers home. And presently "twilight prevailed." Alex, our company boss at a piece of school drawing, suddenly yawned and rubbed his eyes. He blinked valiantly against the inroads of sleep, and then turning his back on interest, went to the house across the lane.
