A Liquor Dealer's Convention.

A liquor dealer's convention was held at Pittsburgh recently. The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate says about it:

They paraded the streets sounding trumpets before them, that the public might be permitted to look upon these noble philanthropists, these benefactors of their fellowmen. The absurdity of their public parade possibly did not strike the mind of any one of them. We have had firemen's parades in the city; but that was all right, for these men had many times imperiled their lives to rescue others and to save burning property. They have earned the respect and gratitude of the people. There have been parades of labor organizations, and that was right, for these are the men who produce wealth, by whose skill and industry we have so many comforts and conveniences in our homes and country. But if these liquor dealers were well dressed, it was because they had reduced to rags thousands of their fellow-citizens. If they were fat, it was at the expense of the leanness of many others. If they were rich, it was because they had made many poor. That these men should flaunt themselves and their fiendish business before the public in the most brazen of all brazen things. If only that mighty and ghastly army of 500,000 drunkards, made such by this traffic, could have joined in this procession—men with bloated bodies, bleared eyes, trembling steps; men in all stages of decay and ruin, their breath poisoning the air, their rags fluttering in the breeze—then the significance of this procession might have been seen. And if, following it, there had been another procession of heart broken wives and mothers, hungry and hapless children, widows and orphans, made such by this business, we could have had a still clearer view of the character of the procession. And if the grave could have for the hour yielded up its dead, the many driven to death by liquor—the suicides, the victims murdered by it, the thousands who died in despair from it, then the horror of the procession would have been almost complete.

These liquor dealers were in session two or three days, taking counsel together as to the best ways and means not only of perpetuating, but of extending their business; as to how best to influence legislation, and to make measures against prohibition, which with one voice they declare does not prohibit. Then they had a banquet; they ate, they drank and were merry. No shriek of terrified wife, no cry of suffering children, broke in on their festivities. No murdered Banquo was visible at their table. And they had a minister of the gospel—we blush with shame to write it—to give some sort of sanctity to their gathering—to respond to one of their ghastly toasts. But the devil, when he wants to assume the respectable, can always find some chaplain for his service. There was no armless hand seen writing strange and luminous letters on the wall of their banquetting room, but for all that, the handwriting is made. God has written it: "Mene mene, tekel, upharsin;" and the long-suffering public are beginning to read it.

Rich and Poor in France.

Philip Gilbert Hamerton, writing in the Atlantic Monthly, denies that there is any real feeling of antagonism between rich and poor in France. Wealthy people who treat the poor with kindness and help them in their distress are looked up to with sincere affection and gratitude. Even in election times, he says, that he never knew it to be made a ground of objection to a Republican candidate that he was a rich man. In fact he believes that social hostility, in France, as elsewhere, becomes intense, only when it is excited by political hostility. If the poor think themselves treated unjustly, they are naturally disposed to resent it. For instance, the reactionaries, who are rich, have, since the last elections, had a sort of understanding among themselves to give as little employment as possible to the wage-earning classes in order to punish them for voting for Republicans. The working classes are reasonably indignant at this and think they have a right to vote as they please. Under such circumstances there will be a grudge against rich people who show such prejudices. But, when the wealthy discharge their duties even incompletely, or even when there is any desire to perform them fairly, Mr. Hamerton has not noticed (and there is no keener observer of what goes on around him) any hostility against the rich as such. Such hostility is confined to anarchists and professional agitators.

The September report of the U. S. department of agriculture, shows a better yield of spring wheat than was expected a month ago. The improvement is in the northern belt—Wisconsin, Minnesota and Dakota. The average yield exceeds 11 bushels, and may reach 11½ bushels per acre. In the south the harvest was disappointing, and rains injured the product in the shock. Returns indicate an average yield of about 12½ bushels per acre. The entire wheat product will apparently exceed that of last year by 90,000,000 bushels. The corn crop prospects indicate over 21 bushels per acre, or nearly 1,600,000,000 bushels. The cotton returns show a vigorous condition of plant and indicate an average yield.
