PECULIAR ACCIDENT.—The Tiro Guardian says:—A peculiar, and what might have been a serious accident, occurred at Lunenburg quarries one day recently. The customary method for thawing dynamite is in hot water. The water, after being heated, is thrown just outside the door, thus causing a quantity of ice to accumulate. One day one of the men took to accumulate, thus causing a quantity of ice to accumulate. One day one of the men took to accumulate, thus causing a quantity of ice to accumulate. One day one of the men took to accumulate, thus causing a quantity of ice to accumulate.

A PECULIAR CASE.—A farmer named Macdonald, living at Mount Stewart, had several sheep stolen from him some time ago. He ascertained that the sheep after being stolen had been sold to a butcher in Charlottetown, by whom they were killed and disposed of in the usual way. He came to town and after searching one or two slaughter houses found the marked "pelts" of two of his flock on the premises of a Grafton Street butcher. Instead of taking steps for the arrest of the thief, he had the butcher, who bought the sheep in good faith, taken in charge. But when the constable who had the butcher in custody took him to jail and requested the keeper to lock him up, he was surprised to learn that he would not receive the prisoner as the proceedings were somewhat irregular. Macdonald then consulted a lawyer as to what action he should take in the matter, and was at once told to abandon his case against the butcher. The farmer acted upon this advice, and the butcher is free once more.
