DOROTHY DIX

Vacillating Suitor

DEAR MISS DIX: I have sought your advice in the past, always with good results. The problem I have now is minor, but I would like help with it. A short time ago I dated a young man and we had a very pleasant evening. Since I knew he had been divorced, I had no intention of becoming serious over him. However, on our second date he said he loved me and wanted to marry me. I assumed, however, this was a line, but he continued to declare his serious intentions on subsequent dates. Finally, my own reserve began to wear down, and I did begin to return his love. Then, lo and behold! He made a date with me and did not keep it, and I haven't heard from him since. Our dating covered only about six weeks. Should I write and ask for an explanation? M. H.

GIRL IS FORTUNATE

ANSWER: It's up to him to offer the explanation, not for you to seek it. If his intentions were at all sincere, his actions would be quite different. I'm afraid a "line" is exactly what he gave you; the fact that he has quite a record of broken romances indicates a vacillating nature. The failing could scarcely always have been the girl's. You were wise not to go overboard in accepting his declarations of love; as it is you emerge with hurt feelings instead of more seriously damaged emotions. Always be wary of the beau who professes fervent love on a first date; rarely is he to be trusted.

DEAR MISS DIX: We are living in the country, at great inconvenience, so we can be near my grandfather, a gentleman of 88. Now, my husband has changed jobs and we must go to the city. However, grandfather is a problem. We hate to leave him here alone, though he's in good health, but he won't come with us. He can we make him change his mind? G. L.

Contract Bridge

A VITAL CONSIDERATION: ENTRIES

Most declarers do not give nearly enough attention to the matter of entries. Observe South's performance in this deal:

The bidding:
North East South West
1♥ Pass 1♠ Pass
2♦ Pass 2♣ Pass
2NT Pass 3♣ Pass
4♠ Pass Pass Pass

The bidding, at any rate, was excellent. West opened a low club, and East took his ace and shifted to the ten of diamonds. Dummy won, and declarer promptly returned honors. This, however, became unnecessary when East "spit his honors," playing the queen on the first lead. South took the trick and continued with the trump jack.

South didn't yet know it, but his chance for the contract died with that play. East, after capturing the second trump lead, persisted in diamonds—and South couldn't get out of the dummy to draw East's low trump. He tried, by leading a high heart in the hope that East had the ace, but there was no such luck—West got in, and his diamond return gave East a ruff for the setting trick.

South should have given more thought to the question of his own entry after taking the first trump trick. Instead of fatally returning the spade jack, he should have led a heart then and there. If West refused to put up his ace, declarer should lead a second heart, and from that time on he would be safe against all forms of attack.

Along a familiar road this evening, we came to our girlhood home by the Strait. Again to welcome our coming, we saw that light in the window kept there for many a year for sons and daughters' homings. We heard the frogs in the little brook which steals through the old orchard chant their love lyrics. And we saw a vacant armchair. Noticed too the kin, James among the number come to occupy it briefly but look up expectantly and prepare to rise from it at the opening of a door. But he whose it was did not enter to greet us and be the pleasant host that he had ever been. But a small woman, oldish in years, it is true, but remarkably young in spirit sat in the old rocker close by. Hands were strangely idle this night of week's end. Perhaps she was satisfied that the work she had given it was "sufficient unto the day"; or maybe all articles of handwork had been completed, and there was no thought of sewing or mending or knitting, in new projects until another workaday week should dawn.

Back now to her former excellent health, she continues, though naturally not to such extent as once, the busy life she has always known. It is filled with a hundred interests of friend and kin. And as we looked back along the span of our acquaintance we saw her for what she has always been to all her children: a good Mother, unselfish, fair, patient, kind-always sharing appreciated items out of her mites or her plenty: a clipping or book perhaps, a magazine serial-story, even in her busyness not missing a number, a slip of a best house-plant, a cutting or a root of shrub for one she is gifted with a green thumb. Generous, not niggardly ever in any matter of

Corns

A remedy for corns is to bind a small piece of lemon to the corn and change daily for three or four days to loosen it. Then soak the foot in warm water and the corn can be easily removed.

Washing Ribbons

If two or three potatoes are grated in a pan of water, they will give better results than soap when washing ribbons or delicate woolen goods.

Putty Stains

To remove putty stains from glass, rub vigorously with a cloth dipped in strong, hot vinegar.
