Of Special Interest to our Farmers

Before Spraying.

In order to spray fruit trees and vines intelligently it is quite essential that we should know something about the insects and pests that we want to destroy. Spraying is developed into an exact science, and while it is not necessary for the farmer to study science to comprehend the theory of spraying, it is quite essential that he should take an interest in the life and habits of the pests.

To begin with life histories of the various fungi we must form the basis of any methods of treatment which may be followed. A study of this must precede any attempt to recommend any spray. At certain stages of their existence most parasitic fungi may be checked quite easily, and at such times they should be attacked. At other periods of their life the very best spraying may have no good effect whatever, and the farmer who undertook it would be discouraged and claim that spraying was useless. The parasitic fungus endeavors to establish itself in the plant to live upon it, and when he has once entered the tissues it is next to impossible to destroy it without killing the plant at the same time. Thus it is essential to perform the work early in the life history of the fungus. The sprays are intended to reach them before they have entered the plants. This is the principle which should underlie all methods of spraying.

From this it can be seen that spraying is preventive rather than curative. It is practically impossible to cure the plant that has once been attacked so that the spores have become established in the tissues. There are some classes of fungus growths which do not enter the tissues, and they are easily dealt with. The powdery mildew of the grape belongs to this class. It grows upon the outer surface of the plant, and it can be easily killed by dusting the plants with flowers of sulphur. The most injurious fungi are those which do not begin outside, and gradually work into the tissues, but which grow mainly within the host plant. The spores of this class of fungi are lodged in the blossom or stem, and they must be reached before the stems and foliage have matured. The stems and expanding blossoms must be covered with some substance that will destroy the spores as soon as they germinate, or even before.—Exchange.

The Best Way to Use Hen Manure.

A young farmer who has had a few years success in the poultry business, asks how he can best use hen manure on the land he cultivates. He has used it in various ways, but never with satisfactory results. In most cases the crops to which it has been applied have been injured rather than benefited. It seems to be so strong as to burn the roots of all plants coming in contact with it. Last year he used it on potatoes, but did not dare to put it in the hill; he spread it on the surface along the rows after the crop was nearly grown, leaving it without cultivating it. It did not injure the crop, nor did it seem to do any good. He is now tempted to abandon its use as a fertilizer, which would be a very foolish thing to do.

Poultry manure is one of the most valuable by-products of the farm. It is more concentrated than most farm manure, for it is usually made from richer material, and contains both the solid and liquid parts. I have several times injured crops when hen manure has been put in the hill or drill. It will even destroy potatoes if applied freely in the hill. It is rich in ammonia which is poison to vegetable or animal life if not greatly diluted.

economical method is to spread it broadcast, and cultivate it into the soil with a cultivator running from three to five inches deep. Nor is there danger of cultivating the ground too much. The more thoroughly the manure is mingled with the soil the better and if the work is done at intervals of a few days it will be better still, as the hard lumps, if there be any, will have time to soften so they will get pulverized and spread about in the soil.

Unless one realizes the strength of poultry manure as compared to other kinds, one is likely to apply it too plentifully, even broadcast. A outload should cover considerably more surface than the same bulk of most other kinds of farm manure. As it is specially rich in nitrogen, it would pay well to spread it in connection with poorer manure, if one has it. To use it as a top-dressing for grass is not often recommended, but I once used some that way with the best results. It changed a thin sod to a thick one, and lasted much longer than I expected. It is not exhausted in a single season.

The manure from a poultry yard ought to be made to produce all the green stuff the flock can use, such as clover, cabbage, and beet root for winter, and besides a large portion of the grain. In New England it pays to purchase wheat and bran for hens, but the corn can be grown at a profit by properly using the droppings and sweepings collected in the houses. Dry soil or sifted coal ashes should be used freely to preserve the manure without waste.—N. W. Cheever in New England Farmer.

When the children are hungry, what do you give them? Food.

When thirsty? Water.

Now use the same good common sense, and what would you give them when they are too thin? The best fat-forming food, of course.

Somehow you think of Scott's Emulsion at once.

For a quarter of a century it has been making thin children, plump; weak children, strong; sick children, healthy.

With valves, suppositories and ointments and dressing a surgical operation, scores and hundreds have turned to Dr. A. W. Chase's ointment and found it an absolute cure for piles.
