ELLEN'S DIARY

Curiosity Cat's Lost Kittens Reappear In The Barn Loft

Today then brought the opening of another haying-season to the folks at Alderlea. In the new of a morning, overlaid with blue sky and interlaid with summer's own charms, we came to a verandah to watch the machines of the mowing move down the lane on the way to a far hayland — Another step took us to enjoy again the exquisite fragrance of a crimson rose, to admire the pretty painted faces of the Shirley poppies, and the orange lilies blossoming now in the border, the latter setting, it came to mind with a sigh, the August shades there.

A great white cloud moved lazily along the blue, on the opposite rise of the valley, touching, it seemed the chimneys of the house on the hill. And the thought lingered for a moment: if that were actually a boat which could bear one off on a trip to make a long wish come true, and if this were the morning to board it, could we go? No matter how much we wished to visit lands afar, to see the glory and the grandeur of storied places, could we embark this morning? Coax James to come away with us, or have to leave him behind, a little lost and bothered over the fact that he fears he will not be able to contribute his usual brisk help to the affairs of the haying? Let the little wash in the hamper await our return? And the sweet of today's birdsong be lost? And papa Starling's Monday chat? And what of the strawberries wating to be preserved? Could we, in the face of all these things, just pick up and go? Not very well, now, could we?

"The haying here means a lot of up hill work" Papa Starling commented with a twinkle, when later he came out on his terrace to watch us spead the wash: the Sunday tablecloth, our best apron, James' plaidie shirt, towels, sheets and all, to the day so good.

"Up hill" we chuckled. "And down dale — and on level fields too!" we said.

"How are we going to do the hay this year?" we asked James, who came by.

He looked away to the fields, a near one rippled to silver by the gentle west wind.

"Like last year, Ellen, I expect; We'll fill the mows with loose hay and bale the rest."

"Ah, ha!" Granddaughter smiled, coming by this afternoon. "Smells as though there's a strawberry preserve in the making, in this kitchen! And what a delectable scent it is!"

"Like roses!" we said.

"Listen! Do you hear something?" Mack questioned, when we lingered in the yard in the afterlight, to see the day go to rest.

"Only the sound of the water falling from the spillways" we said.

"Come!" he smiled happily hastening to a piggery. "It's the kittens! The lost has been found In the loft — they're up there" he nodded. "We'll get to see them in the morning" he said.

What an excited forgathering there was then to hear that mewing above! What smiles, the sounds brought!

"So they weren't gone after all" Alex said "they were just lost a while." And this Monday was altogether good.

Until tomorrow — — Diary — Good-night.....

MARY HAWORTH

Disposition Of Property Worries Neurotic Mother

Dear Mary Haworth: I have a word for the mother who thinks of disinheriting her neglectful married daughter. Please tell her that if she hates her daughter so much, she won't be able to enter the Kingdom of God.

Tell her to worry less about the disposition of her property and think more about where she is going after death, and also where her daughter will go.

She should love her heedless daughter and work for reconciliation. She may pay the good neighbors for their kindness, but she should give most of her money to her daughter. Next to God, a mother should love her children and grandchildren above all else. Sincerely,— E.S.

Dear E.S.: It wasn't my impression that the mother hates her daughter. Rather she seems heartbroken, rejected by her daughter and isolated from her grandchildren.

Her only consolation comes from the neighbor couple, who are friendly and helpful. None of these people, including the daughter, know that she has accumulated some estate.

Her question was, simply, whether she has an obligation to leave her estate to the daughter, or whether she may justifiably bequeath it to the neighbors in appreciation of their kindness.

As the daughter has long since ceased to be a daughter, to all intents and purposes, and as the neighbors have treated the mother sympathetically (by providential design?), I feel she is morally entitled to name them as her heirs, if she likes.

It isn't a matter of being vindictive; it is rather a case of love responding to love. Where love is, God is, Scriptures tell us; and by that token, maybe God is rewarding the just in this situation. M.H.

Dear Mary Haworth: Perhaps you can help me. Our daughter married much against her father's wishes and now he refuses to have anything more to do with her.

I am in the middle and my feelings vacillate from one to the other. I love them both dearly and while I share my daughter's new life by correspondence, it grieves me not to be able to discuss her in my husband's presence.

There is no chance of his relenting, so I am writing for myself. Is it possible for me ever to have peace of mind again? Fortunately I am employed and my work is very demanding, but I go to sleep with the problem and waken with it.

Is there anything I can do? Or will time eventually ease the heartbreak." I am not a morbid person and generally am first to offer encouragement to others. But now I cannot help myself. Please advise me.—B.J.

Dear B.J.: Regardless of whom your daughter has married, your husband's attitude is 100 per cent wrong. Because he is unforgiving he is himself unforgivable, according to the terms of the Lord's Prayer.

As of now, he is guilty of grave sins against love and charity, making pride his master. Not only is he brutally selfish in relation to his daughter, requiring broken obedience as the price of his "love", he is equally selfish in relation to you, implacably enforcing a family rift that continually turns a knife in your spirit, just to keep his ego enthroned.

Is it possible for you to recover peace of mind? Certainly. With the help of prayer, give the situation into God's care. Love your daughter as devotedly as ever; or more so. Speak of her whenever you wish, in any company; and if your husband throws a fit, that's his problem exclusively.

Stop pampering his unreason. Return to the practice of healthy behavior. Let him discover that insofar as he shuts your daughter out of his heart, he blights his own life, driving a wedge between himself and you too— by his own misguided choice.

You'd better be lonely, in his disfavor, than on the fence, tearing your integrity to shreds, trying to appease his senseless sulking. M.H.

Mary Haworth counsels through her column, not by mail or personal interview. Write her in care of The Guardian.
