BULLETINS FROM BIRDLAND

FRIENDLY SOUL

What a joy to know that our migratory birds are returning. The earliest of the flycatchers is the Phoebe; possibly because it did not have as far to travel as the rest, never wintering beyond Mexico. First comes the male, in pussy willow season, soon followed by his wife, that is his counterpart. Oddly enough this friendly soul is difficult to identify, being one of several very similar species. In order to make no mistake, we need to take into consideration just where the bird is seen, its behaviour, call, and minute details of plumage.

There is always at least one good reason why a particular location should be chosen by any bird. A Phoebe's favourite place for a nest is on some beam or other flat surface underneath an old bridge crossing a stream. Mud will then be handy for the home's foundation; moisture brings insects around, which means plenty of food; a post or railing makes a satisfactory look-out perch from which to dart after prey. However, some projecting ledge under a verandah roof or barn may be the desirable spot because of the protection from Hawks or Owls. Before civilization overran this continent the Phoebe made its nest in a niche of a shelving cliff, but now is glad to have man's company.

Although we are delighted to have this bird around because of itself and on account of the way it rids a neighbourhood of various kinds of flies, mosquitoes, ants and grasshoppers, we are not so fond of the Phoebe's bulky nest. This is owing to the bird which invariably seem to gather there. But a spray with ordinary insect powder usually stops that nuisance, and does no harm to our little feathered friends.

The Phoebe is no singer. Its call is the distinct, energetic repetition of its own name, "Phoebe, phoe-be." The Wood Pewee, seldom found very near habitations, has a three-syllabled, long drawn out call, and its voice is less vigorous and more mournful.

In order to differentiate between the seven inch Phoebe and other flycatchers, we must note that its head is a little darker than its greenish grey body, the wings have no bars, and the legs and feet are rather heavily made. Also the sideways twitching of a Phoebe's tail and the snapping of its black bill just before it dives after a passing fly are quite characteristic.

What Woodpecker prefers ants?

and be monarchs of all they surveyed. . . . No doubt you have often wondered how so many persons crowded together in such a small space, managed to prepare their meals. The Captain of the "Polly" had prepared for just such an emergency. Cooking grates had been set up outside the steerage quarters where from sunrise to sunset, weather permitting, steerage passengers were permitted to cook in turns. Sometimes the women-folk used giant iron pots into which went enough potatoes to serve several families. This saved time and labor and worked out to their mutual advantage.

Under such conditions. Jean and her husband sailed to the Garden of the Gulf. In calm seas and in rough, this young woman's courage never flickered. She bolstered up those whose courage was ebbing at the length and dreariness of the voyage. Indeed, she kept herself so busy that she had no time left to worry. There were children who needed a bit of extra care; sick folk who required nursing, and had it not been for Jean MacDonald's tact and courage, it is doubtful whether the voyagers would have made the crossing without getting embroiled in family quarrels.

One day, when the "Polly" ran into a storm and the hatches had to be battened down to keep out the sea which went right over her deck, Jean still kept a staunch heart. Picture, if you can, that awful day on the wild Atlantic with most of the passengers crowded in the gloom and shadow of their narrow confines! Only a few candles cast their feeble light in the steerage quarters. There they huddled together, while the noise of the ocean rose above the cries of the frightened little ones and the "Polly" staggered like a drunkard to keep her feet on the waves.

"Why don't ye get your pipes," Jean said to her husband. "Then we can a' hae a little music to accompany the sounds of 'the sea.'" Thus encouraged, other pipers took up the cue and soon the soothing effects of the pipes brought cheer to the hearts of the frightened immigrants.

After dreary weeks, the Atlantic voyage came to an end but even when Belfast and the New World were a reality, Jean Mac-
