ap17—f

While this talk is going on, Eugene is hard at work at M. Cauchon's. He is thinking of Annette all the while that he is not recalling his artist longings, but that does not hinder him from performing his task as a careful workman should. Old Theophile Cauchon, with his hands clasped loosely behind him, and with his head a little thrown back, peers up at the work. He is a small man, wearing a scarlet dressing-gown with huge tassels. Everyone in Lisieux knows that dressing-gown. Its owner goes to market in it three times a week and winds in and out among the market people "like a walking fire," to use a comparison made by one whose parsnips Cauchon had once cheapened. He is a kindhearted man, in spite of his many whims and crotchets, and young Bernay's neat workmanship pleases him.

"Thou hast done well, Bernay," he says when the young fellow comes down from the step-ladder, where he has been standing. "I may send for thee again, very possibly. But thou art not much like other young men, it seems to me. I like to see young men like thee of a merrier turn than thou art. Look you," he continues, laying one stubby forefinger across the other as he speaks, "There is but one life to live."

The young man, who is arranging his tools, makes an impatient gesture at this point.

"I know what you would say, mon fils. The priests and the women think differently, but they are mistaken. They are mistaken," he repeats with an air of kindly tolerance, "and thou will think as I do when thou art older. Listen to me again. But there is but one life to live. Why not be happy and merry while it lasts? Answer me this," he concludes, with a flourish of his arm that sends a Dresden shepherdess on the table beside him crashing to the floor.

The young man says nothing, but gazes at the broken shepherdess.

"Bah! it is nothing," says the gentle old skeptic, giving the pieces a push with his foot. "There is more china in the shops of Lisieux. But thou didst not answer, because there is no good answer to give. It is plain to be seen, my friend, that thou art not happy to-day. What vexes thee? I am an old man, and perhaps I can be thy physician in this matter. Thou art in love, perhaps, and there are difficulties in the way."

"It is partly that that troubles me, Monsieur Cauchon," says Eugene, moved to sudden frankness by the other's friendly tones and manner. "I thought as much," nods the old man triumphantly. "Let us know the whole," he adds, pushing up his spectacles.

"Then thou must know, Monsieur," responds Eugene slowly, "that I do not like being a carpenter."

"Mais non, and thou so skilful with thy tools! It is wonderful. I cannot understand it," ejaculated the elder man, pushing his hands deep into the pockets of the scarlet dressing gown. "If not a carpenter, mon ami, what then?"

"An artist, monsieur," says Bernay simply.

"Ah, that is quite another thing," observes the old Frenchman, regarding his companion critically through his spectacles. "And so thou wouldst be an artist, then. There are no artists in Lisieux," he adds half to himself, and thereupon falls into a reverie that lasts so long that Eugene fancies his employer has fallen asleep, for he has leaned back in a chair with closed eyes.

"But I am keeping thee waiting for thy money, my son," says Theophile, starting up at last. "How much do I owe thee?"

"Three francs, Monsieur Cauchon."

"It is too much, too much," grumbles the old man from force of habit. "But here it is, however. Come here again tomorrow. I shall have something of importance to say. Do not forget."

"But no, Monsieur," and Annette's lover goes his way, wondering what old Cauchon can want to say to him on the morrow.

Theophile Cauchon has not lived in Lisieux all his days. Indeed it is but six years since he came from Paris, where his money was all made (and the old man is very rich), thinking to spend the rest of his life in this provincial city. He has lived alone with his housekeeper, a distant cousin, and his servants, and dividing his time about equally between his books and his plants has cared but little for Lisieux society. But within a year or two the infirmities of age have begun to make themselves felt, for Theophile is past 70, and their presence has set him to wondering what disposition he shall make of his property. His cousin Catharine is as old as himself and not more likely to survive him than he to outlive her, and he has no other relatives to whom he may bequeath his fortune. He often thinks of this, and to-day when Eugene fancied that he was asleep he was saying to himself that he would like to help this young carpenter to carry out his aspirations, and perhaps if Eugene proved grateful to adopt him as his heir. Something in the young fellow's manner reminds him of his brother Armand who kied at 25—fully a half century ago.

"And so thou wouldst be an artist," he says to Eugene when the latter appears at the Cauchon mansion the next day.

"But yes, Monsier Cauchon. If I could be an artist I should be the happiest fellow in the world," answers Bernay momentarily forgetting his love for Annette.

"If thou hast the needful talent," observes Cauchon, "it may not be impossible to be happy in just that way."

"I have painted a little," Eugene says modestly, "and Monsieur Louchard, the artist who was here three years ago, said I had some skill in that direction."

"And thy father, what says he on this matter?"

"He wishes me to remain a carpenter. And that is what I must do, since if I were to go to Paris for the needful instruction there is no way for me to live while I am studying, and my father has no money to spend for me," says Eugene dejectedly.

"But I have, thou must know," says Cauchon, smiling good-humoredly and adjusting his spectacles.

"Thou! for me?" stammers the young man, bewildered.

"Most assuredly. Quite enough for thy purpose," answers Theophile, enjoying the other's bewilderment.

"Thou art too kind to a poor fellow like me," said Eugene. "I can never repay such goodness."

"Who talks of repayment?" is the response to this. "Listen then. When thy art is acquired I shall want my portrait painted. That is all, and now for the arrangements."

"The arrangements," as Theophile calls them, are very simple. Eugene is to spend three years in Paris in the studio of his friend Louchard, who has more than once said he would like to have Bernay for a pupil, and Monsieur Cauchon will be responsible for his support during that time and for as much longer as may be necessary.

There is quite a stir in Lisieux when the townpeople hear that Bernay is to become a Paris art student.

"What foolishness," say some of the young fellows in the Rue aux Fevres, a little jealous, it may be, of his good fortune. "Eugene will do better to keep to his trade."

But not all who know him are of this opinion. Madeleine Sanchon exults over Eugene'e good fortune and snubs Jules Vagnon unmercifully when he ventures a word on the other side.

"Thou shalt paint my portrait on thy return," says one of the canons of Saint Jacques, and several other notables of Lisieux similarly encourage him.

Monsieur Cauchon after taking this step goes about in wonderfully good spirits and is hardly to be blamed if he feels a glow of satisfaction over his action. He rather enjoys overhearing the market women in the Grande Place say to each other: "See, that is the walking fire who is so generous. Who would have thought it? And it was but the other day he made me take two sous less for my eggs."

Let us not blame him too severely for his satisfaction with himself. You and I perform our generous deeds in secret and blush when they are discovered, but then all men are not like you or me, and after all, what would you?

At Thy Feet

Low at Thy feet I bow, O, sacred Master!
Here let me lift my waiting heart to Thee;
Here let me feel Thy touch of love and healing;
Here let me lie in my humility!

As birds of song who swell the sweetest praises,
Build low their nests beneath the grassy mound,
So thro' life's shadows keep me, blessed Master,
Low at Thy feet, where perfect peace is found.

Here fill my soul with Thy reviving Spirit,
Inspire my lips to sing a nobler song;
Till at the dawn of that eternal morning,
I shall rise to join the choral throng.

Sweet it will be to burst these earthly fetters,
And soar above where angel faces greet;
But sweeter far to clasp Thy hand of welcome,
Kneeling in rapture at Thy sacred feet.

A Brockville Druggist's Case.

BROCKVILLE, April 24th.—The popular impression is that doctors and druggists seldom take their own medicine. This is no doubt true, but when a doctor takes ill he generally calls in one of his own profession, in whose skill he has every confidence, or when a druggist is in a similar situation, he often puts his faith in the preparations of some other chemist which he knows give good results. Both the doctors and druggists in such cases show their good sense. A case in point happened in this town a short time ago. Mr. F. M. Turner, the well known and popular druggist, who is now travelling for Parke, Davies & Co., has for a long time been a sufferer from congestion and inflammation of the kidneys. He tried a great many remedies, but without results. His patrons, however, spoke so highly of Dodd's Kidney Pills that he was induced to try them. He now states that he is completely cured, and to your correspondent he said that as a rule he had very little faith in patent medicines, but that for the cure of kidney troubles, rheumatism, backache, etc., he does not know of any remedy that is giving such good results as Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Mr. Peter Lingley, Councillor, Peterville, Queens Co., N. B., says:

"Oct. 31, 1892.—Last winter I had a very severe attack of the Grip, which left me very feeble and reduced in flesh. I had no appetite, and was so nervous I could not sleep. The Telephone Company

PARTIES using the Telephones would find talking much more satisfactory if they would observe the following rules:—

1st. Speak with the mouth about four inches from the transmitter.

2nd. Speak in a moderate tone of voice, not too loud, and distinctly.

3rd. Place the telephone so as to cover the ear, just as if you wished to shut out all other sounds. Do not press too hard on the ear.

It is possible to talk and be heard when standing back two or three feet from the transmitter, if you shout loud enough, but it is not a pleasant mode of conversation, is entirely unnecessary, and is a useless waste of wind and lungs, besides being very annoying to all within range of your voice.
