Global War in Sole Political and Sole

By HAROLD MORRISON
Canadian Press Staff Writer
WASHINGTON (CP)—Global war is obsolete, says the Centre for the Study of Democratic Institutions in the United States, concluding that a demarcated world politics no longer is obtainable but intrinsically practicable.

Published in book form as the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union prepare to begin crucial Moscow negotiations on a partial nuclear test-ban treaty, the analysis maintains that the war system as a foundation for international politics has collapsed and the only thing keeping it alive is the "mindless force of technological development."

Students of politics and social and physical sciences somewhere had find ways of arresting the grim advance of increasingly huge nuclear schemes for sooner or later these schemes would destroy humanity, says the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Learning.

Prepared by military analyst Walter Mills and by industrial consultant James Real, the report is published by the Macmillan Company as The Abolition of War.

ESTIMATES HUGE
It estimates that at current rates, the U.S. will have the equivalent of 10,000,000 tons of TNT in nuclear weapons power by 1968, roughly about 100 times as much as now.

"If one doubles this number to account for the nuclear hold-ups then projected for the U.S. orbit," the report says, "the world's nuclear power will be honored by the existence of more explosive dedicated to our mutual containment than was used to excavate for Hoover dam."

Global war no longer is feasible as a means of settling world differences, the writers contend. Power is accumulating in four or five great centres—the U.S., Western Europe, the Soviet Union and Red China, and these countries or regions would have to test their power in ways other than the writers say.

The really basic interests of none can be furthered by military struggle—certainly not a struggle waged with nuclear bombs.

Another point, the report says: "Less useful. War, even of the peripheral variety, is becoming less practicable and its effects less politically useful or credible in the international order as it already exists. The terrible mass destruction weapons are state-mated and conventional armed forces, where they are used at all, are used more and more in the way that national and proposed international police forces of a demilitarized world would be required to use."

Considering the degree of social and economic organization which the modern world has arrived, "a demilitarized world would be entirely practicable."

"Perhaps the greatest har to attainment is the deeply held belief that it is impossible and utopian. . . . In the Twentieth century such a system of international relations has been possible; as time goes on it will grow more possible. We already have a world power structure that encourages the creation of power. It is to convince men of this fact."

For the first time in history has been projected for the non-U.S. orbit," the report says, "the world's nuclear power will be honored by the existence of more explosive dedicated to our mutual containment than was used to excavate for Hoover dam."

Global war no longer is feasible as a means of settling world differences, the writers contend. Power is accumulating in four or five great centres—

Churches Sunday, a message from Paul-Emile Cardinal LeClerc was read in all of Montreal's Roman Catholic churches asking for prayers for the success of their deliberations—"for the brethren who have gathered in our midst."

The delegates—theologians of what has been called the "second reformation"—are meeting under the auspices of the World Council of Churches to seek new insights into the problems that divide Christians.

In accordance with a resolution passed at the last faith and order conference in Lund, Sweden in 1952, the United Church of Canada—as the official host church—held an "open" communion service for all delegates who wished to attend.

The preacher, Rev. J. Russell Chabot, principal of Bangor United Theological College, expressed his appreciation for the efforts to bring the ecumenical movement to the man in the new.

It was often easier "to talk to the unity at the high levels than to practice at the local level where we have to live in harmony with men and women and families we know well."

FIND ANCIENT PLAY
PARIS (Reuters)—Research in Paris on a 2,000-year-old Egyptian mummy has disclosed large extracts from a Greek comedy by the little-known Menander, who lived from 342 to 292 B.C. Prof. Andre Batistelle of the Sorbonne says ancient Egyptian undertakers used the papyrus of Menander's "The Sicelion" to make the wrappings for the mummy. The discovery adds 40 lines to the 20 lines already known of the comedy, making perhaps half the total.

RESTRICT COMMUNION
Many Christian bodies regard Holy Communion, or the Lord's Supper, as the central act of worship, but the majority of these restrict it to their own members and those called "closed" communion.

Some delegates said this is "a serious restriction" and that the time has come to assault the barriers around the Lord's table.

One went so far as to say intercommunion is "the only ecumenical problem" that really matters and that it may turn out to be the "make or break" in the search for Christian unity.

Another delegate prominently said that this is an exaggeration of the importance of the issue.

Reporters were admitted to the session, but those who really matter are those who speak by name without express permission.

Professor J. Robert Nelson, a Methodist faculty member of the non-denominational Oberlin, Ohio, Graduate School of Theology, said it is clear now that the ecumenical movement has united in common all the policies and laws of various churches regarding people going to intercommunion and to condemn them, but to ask by what authority some people are excluded.

Opening lead—six of hearts. There is a hand where you have to follow precisely the straight and narrow path to get the proper result. You can wander from the freeway on the golf course and recover by making a good second shot, but at the bridge table, you may never get a second chance if you miss the first one.

West leads in three notrump and South is a heart. Declarer starts with the king and plays the ten of clubs, intending to finesse if West follows low.

However, West covers with the king and South wins in dummy with the ace. The situation
