Thoughts For Our Time

By His Eminence Cardinal McGuigan

May 16 of this year was the anniversary of two great papal encyclicals. It was the sixtieth anniversary of Leo XIII's "The Condition of the Working Classes" and the twentieth anniversary of Pius XI's "The Reconstruction of the Social Order." The latter was written to commemorate the appearance of the former. As the titles of these encyclicals indicate they are concerned with the betterment of society. Though these encyclicals might be considered old today, a reading of them will be enough to convince anyone that they are really still current documents with a vital contemporary value.

If we look back over the last sixty years we can easily note a great improvement, at least in some respects, in the status of the worker and his standard of living. Legislation has done a great deal to remedy some of the worst ills which were afflicting the worker. Yet the world at the present moment is in a state of social and economic unrest. We hear more today than ever before of the worker's revolution. The worker's problems have not been solved. That is the reason why these documents still have a great value for us today.

It would be preposterous to claim that these encyclicals supply easy and detailed answers to all the complex problems of the moment. They do not. In fact, it was not technical problems which the Popes discussed but the far more important moral principles underlying the entire social order. The basic and fundamental note which these two great Popes emphasized was that economics and statecraft cannot be divorced from religion and morality.

When Leo XIII died W. T. Stead, a non-Catholic American, called him "the Nestor of the human race." Aware of Leo's constant solicitude for the oppressed and disinherited throughout the world this famous American reviewer looked upon him as "one who spent his life—the whole ninety-three years of it—in an honest, wearisome attempt to bring heaven down from the skies, so that even here and now the toil-

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

It took fourteen years of incessant labor to build the Mont Cenis Tunnel which runs from France to Italy. This feat of modern engineering is eight miles long and for practically its whole length, it is lined with brick or stone. The size of the tunnel is approximately 26 feet, 4 inches by 18 feet, 8 inches, and it carries the double line of railway connecting Paris and Turin.

The spiral tunnel at Field, B. C., is another feat of modern engineering that is nothing short of amazing. Twisting, turning and doubling to avoid steep inclines, it fairly takes one's breath away. In one place it runs three miles to go forward half a mile. At another, it crosses and recrosses a valley by six bridges, each succeeding one being a little higher than the other. Some of the trestle bridges are as high as St. Paul's Cathedral, and the millions of logs that went into these gigantic structures were felled and sawed hard by.

That is but one picture to be viewed by passengers travelling over the Canadian Pacific Railway, the pride of Canada, and one of the greatest railway systems in the world.

Mark Twain could make people laugh or cry at will, but when it came to investing shakels or savelly them, he didn't have any more sense than the most of us. There was only one stock that the famous author would have nothing to do with and that was the Bell Telephone which would have made him a millionaire in quick time. Instead, he went into business and lost everything but his shoes.

General Grant had the ability to get into the White House but he wasn't smart enough to steer clear of Wall Street. So the financial sharks stripped him.

Charles II, King of England, was so deep in the red that he gave William Penn that parcel of land now known as the State of Pennsylvania, for $75,000.

The last words of the wise Socrates were to ask a friend to pay back the debt of the rooster that he'd borrowed to have something for supper. And the last word that Napoleon ever spoke on earth was the word "Josephine." She was his only true love, and his love letters written to her on the battlefields are today worth $20,000. Here is one of 'em.

"My Dear Josephine: "You have inspired me with a love that has taken away my reason. I can't eat. I can't sleep. I don't care for my friends. I don't care for glory. I value victory only because it pleases you. If it weren't for that I should leave the army and hurry back to Paris and fling myself at your feet."

"You have inspired me with limitless love; you have filled me with an intoxicating frenzy. Never an hour passes without my looking at your picture, and never an hour passes without my covering it with kisses."

most women would get out of that kind of language! Yet, strange to say, Josephine didn't even bother to answer those letters. Yet the great soldier went right on loving her to the end.

The Nile is the most romantic river in history. With never failing regularity, the waters rise from June till October and then recede again until the river reaches its lowest point once more in the following June. Ever since the dawn of history, this phenomenon has gone on without interruption. The rising waters gradually run out and flood the valley for two months. Then the flood recedes, leaving behind the fertile silt which produces some of the finest crops in the world.

It takes 1036 million gallons of water per day to supply the needs of New York City, which, incidentally, is the most adequate supply of pure water in the world, and, despite the fact that nearly $190,000,000 has been expended on the great aqueduct works, the daily "ration" costs each inhabitant only 3-4 of a cent! Should a further supply be needed in the future, 700 million more gallons per day can be made available by tapping certain tributaries of the Delaware River.

Primitive man thought of the human body as animated by spirits. Later the spirit of man was thought to be peculiar to man and not found in brutes. But the work of such renowned evolutionists as Darwin and Huxley and the study of animal psychology threw a flood of light on the emotions and instincts. Today the work of medicals on abnormal behavior, as seen in nervous diseases, is doing much toward uncovering valuable material that has to do with distinctly human motives and desires.

The late Mahatma Gandhi carried his false teeth in his loin cloth. He used them only for eating.
