Regulatory Works Are Seen Best Way To Control Lakes

TORONTO (CP) — The most practical solution to low water levels in the Great Lakes would be to install regulatory works so that the flow of water could be controlled throughout the entire lakes system, the director of the Great Lakes Institute said here.

Addressing the Royal Canadian Institute, George Burwash Langford said that even during winter when water levels are lowest in the lakes, "we are wasting water down the St. Lawrence River at a prodigious rate."

"Some 200,000 cubic feet of water goes past the port of Montreal on its way to the sea each second. This is waste water which we could well use on the 'upper' lakes but unfortunately we have no means of holding it on these lakes."

Mr. Langford said that while the levels of Lakes Superior and Ontario can be controlled, the levels of Lake Huron and Erie cannot be maintained.

"If we had similar controls on Lakes Huron and Erie, then we could maintain the levels of all the lakes at whatever elevations were most suitable," he said.

"This would mean allowing less water to flow down the St. Lawrence River in times of reduced rainfall and more water in times of excess rainfall so that we would require both gated structures to hold back water in times such as these and enlarged channels to permit increased flows."

He said the United States corps of engineers already has concluded this plan is possible. "All we need now is the willingness of our two nations to undertake this as the final stage in completing the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes waterways," the authority from our two federal governments and something in the nature of $1,000,000,000 to get on with the job."

GALLERY APPOINTMENT
TORONTO (CP)—David Stoppford Brooke, formerly assistant to the director of Smith College Museum of Art, Northampton, Mass., has been appointed curator of the Art Gallery of Toronto. He succeeds Dr. Jean Sutherland Boggs who now is Washington University's Steinhilber professor of art history, St. Louis, Mo. Born near London in 1931, Mr. Brooke was an art instructor at Harvard University and later assistant curator of the university loan department of Harvard's Fogg Art Museum.
