could say.
"I'm trying to think what we should do," he proceeded quickly. "I wonder if it is any use trying to get round, as things are. In any case, I don't suppose she'll want to see us in the circumstances."
"No, I don't suppose so. No, I think we'd just better move off home."
They continued to stand in perplexity among the empty seats; then Robin suddenly squeezed her hand more tightly.

"Good lord, Laurette, do you see who's in the box? Look it's Inspector West, How on earth did he get here so quickly? He couldn't have! He must have been in the theater."
Laurette's excitement and astonishment were as great as his own. "Get hold of him. Signal; try to catch his eye. I want to talk to him. It's time I did. I've made up my mind. I must tell him about Ersk. I can't keep it secret any longer, whatever the consequences may be."
Swiftly Robin turned to look at her. Her expression was determined but serene. Unconsciously he felt uplifted at the knowledge that she intended at last to make voluntary confession.

He smiled into her eyes, and, still holding her by the hand, drew her out along the passage between the seats and was able to make his way toward the stage box.
"Inspector West!" he called from the edge of it; then realizing that his voice had not carried above the hubbub behind him, he shouted loudly: "Inspector West!"
The inspector straightened himself as the hall reached him and turned to look down at them. His brows lifted in amazement.
"I must see you, Inspector," said

Robin in answer to the questioning stare. "Will you tell these people to let us round?"
"Certainly—tell them I said so. That sufficient," he said authoritatively, and waved Robin to the stalls exit.
As quickly as they could Robin and Laurette made their way to the door at the back of the box through the small crowd of sensation-mongers clustered there.
At that moment West himself appeared in the doorway.
"All right," he sang out to the attendant. "Let that lady and gentleman pass."
