RIGHTED AT LAST

BY MARY CECIL HAY

Author of "The Arundel Motto," "Nora's Love Test," "Back to the Old Home," Etc.

"I will," cried Lawrence, in a voice of suppressed rage; "and remember that after I have left your presence to-day, it will be too late for you to avail yourself of the immunity I have offered you. I shall go from here at once to Miss Craven—I say to her first," amended Mr. Haughton, the color rising in his moody face, as he brought forward this untrue excuse, "as being now the most influential member of the family; and I shall lay the whole deception before her. From there I shall go—"

"Your destination is a matter of no moment at all to me, sir. And your cab is waiting."

"Then you refuse this compromise?" blurted out Lawrence.

Deficient in proof as he felt himself to be, he knew that a mutual arrangement would be a much safer and speedier arrangement for him than the arduous following up of this tangible clue.

"I refuse all idea of compromise with you, Mr. Haughton. I do not even understand the term as applicable between us. You are at liberty, so far as I am concerned, to go where you choose. You have for months been paving the way for this disclosure; pray finish the work you have in hand. Need I remind you once again that your cab is waiting?"

"You understand, then," observed the lawyer, with a hard, long gaze into his companion's face, "that your real name and character are known to me, and, before the day is over, shall be known to others. After I have left you, it will be too late for you to attempt dissimulation further."

"If you utter one word more of this kind to me, sir," interrupted Royden, raising himself from his leaning posture against the chimney, and facing Lawrence Haughton with his long, dark eyes aflame, "you shall answer it in a way you little anticipate. Possibly your confidential clerk or ally has informed you how he was punished for dogging my footsteps practically as you have dogged them theoretically. Let his example be a warning to you, for there is but one way of dealing with dastardly insinuations."

"I shall consider now," exclaimed Mr. Haughton, his clenched fist shaking in wrath, and his lips compressed and hard, "that you have brought upon yourself all that follows. I would, if you had accepted my very simple conditions, have guarded your secret. If you had left England—and no one knows better than yourself how dangerous for you is every hour's sojourn here—I would have buried the truth as safely as you yourself could do."

"A lawyer, I believe," observed Royden, carelessly, "understands the meaning of such a term as Misprision of Felony."

"But—but," cried Lawrence, waxing hotter and hotter in his rage at the insinuation, and because there dawned no sign of acquiescence in the proud, still face opposite him, "if you choose to persist in passing yourself off as a man of unblemished character, and—"

"Be silent, sir," interrupted Royden; "my character is not in your hands to clear or blacken. I will thank you to understand that our interview is at an end. I have no word further to say to you, unless I express the hope that in your further search for old Mr. Myddelton's murderer, you may be able to secure a more able auxiliary than your cowardly little clerk, and"—Royden's eyes under the heavy lashes were bright for a moment with quizzical amusement—"and a victim more easily cowed, and duped, and driven than myself. Good-evening."

With the last words he turned and sauntered to the window, opening the door as he passed it. The lawyer could not fail to understand the scornful hint.

and he walked toward the door, his heavy step heavier than usual.

"Good-evening," he said, answering with a scorn equal to Royden's, though savage instead of cool. "All which follows this interview you have brought upon yourself."

No answer from the figure standing at the window, and Mr. Haughton left the room in a passion which, though suppressed, boded a thorough willingness to inflict all the suffering which it lay in his power to give.

The soft dusk of the May night filled the room where Royden sat; the letters were still unwritten, and the invitations still lay unheeded. Pierce had twice been in to rouse his master from his reverie, but Pierce's master was not to be roused. And, if Lawrence Haughton could just then, have re-entered the handsome room, his feelings of mortification need not have weighed so heavily upon that exhilarating consciousness of approaching revenge.

"Nine o'clock, sir. Will you not dress?"

The valet had lighted up the rooms now, and knew it was high time to disturb his master in earnest.

Royden changed his seat, and drew a sheet of paper before him.

"Not yet, Pierce," he said. "I will ring in an hour's time. If I ring twice, I shall want one of the grooms to dispatch a telegram for me. I have not decided yet whether I will go myself."

"But you promised to go, sir, and returned on purpose."

"Where?"

Pierce explained sedately. It had never struck him that his master could have meditated any journey beyond the drive to Sir Philip Somerson's London house.

Royden looked absently up from his writing while the explanation was given. Then he said he had not decided. With this usually curt reply the valet had to be content, but so unused was he to any changeable conduct in his master, that his surmises were many.

"He returned on purpose for this ball," so the valet's musings ended; "and I don't see what need have changed his decision. I wish I hadn't promised Mr. Haughton admission until I knew it was the master's wish to see him. I always dread these telegrams for Westleigh, because I believe he'd bear anything rather than harass her. I don't like that quiet, haughty look of his to-night; it means suffering for the master."

Nervous Debility.

A Sufferer From Weak Blood and Exhausted Nerves Tells of His Cure by Using Dr. Chase's Nerve Food.

Mr. A. T. P. Lalame, railway agent at Clarenceville, Que., writes:—"For twelve years I have been run down with nervous debility. I suffered much, and consulted doctors, and used medicines in vain. Some months ago I heard of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food, used two boxes, and my health improved so rapidly that I ordered twelve more.

"I can say, frankly, that this treatment has no equal in the medical world. While using Dr. Chase's Nerve Food I could feel my system being built up until now I am strong and healthy. I cannot recommend it too highly for weak, nervous people."

Dr. Chase's Nerve Food is a tonic and restorative of inestimable worth. It makes the blood rich, the nerves strong, increases the weight, and cures all weaknesses and diseases of the nerves and blood. In pill form, 50 cents a box, at all dealers, or Edmansson, Bates and Co., Toronto.

both from Lawrence Haughton's morose neglect and his sister's hard displeasure.

"As for Hervey," said Phoebe, a smile struggling through her tears, as Honor led her to talk of the family at Deergrove, "we don't see much of him. He is always with you, isn't he, Honor?"

"If so, he will be with you, too," smiled Honor; "so you will see. At any rate, he is going with us to-night to Lady Somerson's."

"Oh, I cannot," gasped Phoebe, the old affliction strong upon her; "I have no dress."

"Wait and see," said Honor, with a kiss; "there are some garments in your dressing-room, little Frau, which we are going to investigate presently; and if you don't look—"

She had paused to take a card from the salver which a footman, entering softly, handed to her. Her eyes had fallen carelessly enough upon the name, but then they had darkened, and, as she took up the card her fingers covered it.

"I will come to the library," she said, dismissing the man with a glance. "I must go down-stairs for a few minutes, Phoebe," she added, rising and holding the card still hidden in her hand. "Take care of yourself until I come back in a few minutes' time."

Phoebe nodded from her large arm-chair, still full of wonder at the quiet, gracious bearing which seemed natural to Honor now, while she was still just the bright and girlish Honor of old days.
