Tomorrow's Promise

By Temple Bailey
Continued

Vicky wondered how much she meant of it. Yet in a sense it was true. Elinor had no sense of domesticity and men wanted that in a wife, even the most modern of them. They didn't know it, but they did.

Anne was saying to Elinor, "You can go right up. He'll be glad to see you."

Vicky went upstairs with Elinor but left her at the door, so that Elinor entered alone.

Francis was sitting up in a big chair by the window and there was no one with him. With the strong light full upon him he looked thin and old. Yet neither illness nor age could take from him his fine air of distinction. He held out his hand to her. "It was good of you to come."

"No, I wanted to. When we knew you were ill, David and I felt it was dreadful that you might never know how we felt, might never know how sorry we are that things had to be."

"Did they have to be, Elinor?"

"Perhaps not, if you and I had not been such fools when we were young. Thinking life had no give us everything and that nothing was required of us. David has taught me a lot about life, Francis. I shall never be good enough for him. You and I didn't think much about goodness, did we? But David makes me think of it. He wouldn't come with me, but I've never seen him so broken up over anything as your illness. He isn't happy, Francis. I can never make him happy. That's my punishment, perhaps... that I shall never make him happy."

"Yet he loves you?"

"Yes. But love should have meant a different thing to David. Something to be proud of. And he's not proud of having stolen me from you."

Francis was aware that here was a different Elinor from the one he had known. David had waked in her something which had never before been waked. He reflected that he himself might have waked it had he clung to his boyish ideals. But he had not clung to them and so he and Elinor had drifted with the tide. David had not drifted. He had sinned against his friend. He had sinned against society. But there was something about him that was holding Elinor, commanding her respect as he, Francis, had never commanded it. Yet she too would never be happy. She held within herself no reserves of self-sacrifice or unselfishness. Perhaps after all her love for David was the most unselfish thing she had even known.

He said gently, "I hold no grudge against David."

If her vanity suffered a shock at the ease with which he seemed to forgive his rival, she gave no sign. "You were always splendid," she said, and he smiled a little at the extravagance of her praise.

Her beauty still shone and sparkled, but it left him cold. "Go back and tell David," he said, "to let the past bury the past. Whatever mistakes we have made, whatever enmities we have felt, seem of little account when we come so near the end of things as I have come..."

his voice died away and presently he reached out his hand to her. "We are a pair of fools, Elinor," he said. "A pair of fools. You found the right word for it. But we can't go back. That's the tragedy of it—that life cannot be lived over again."

"I wouldn't know how to live it over again if I had a chance," she said shakily. "That's always been the trouble with me, Francis. I'm a ship without a rudder." She rose. "Anne will stay with you?"

"I think she will. I'm not sure it will be the best thing for her. But I'm selfish."

"And Vicky?"

"Vicky will go back to the school."

Elinor glanced at him. His face was impassive. "What does Anne think of that—the separation?"

"It will be hard for her, but Vicky insists. And they will see each other often. Vicky will come here for all holidays."

"Some day Anne will marry. What

Sentenced To Hang In Time-Bomb Trial

After a 17-day trial, a criminal assizes court in Quebec City found Genereux Ruest, seen above, a crutch-carrying cripple, guilty of murder in time bombing of an airliner last year, in Quebec, which claimed 23 lives. The verdict was reached after only 13 minutes' deliberation and the judge then passed the death sentence under which Ruest is to be hanged March 16. The sentence sent the 54-year-old watchmaker hobbling off in the footsteps of J. Albert Guay, whose hanging for engineering the bomb plot is fixed for Jan. 12.

Retail Merchants Business Meeting

The Retail Merchants Committee of the Summerside Board of Trade held a business meeting on Monday evening in the town hall presided over by the chairman, Alan Holman.

Closing hours for local stores was given consideration and it was recommended by the members present that the daily closing hours for local stores after the Christmas season would be five o'clock and at nine o'clock on Saturday night.

The committee further gave favorable consideration to a proposal to hold a town-wide sale in Summerside on January 18-19-20.

All local merchants will be invited to participate and further plans in this connection will be discussed at a future meeting.

The committee agreed that this sale would be a splendid local project to promote and signified its willingness to recommend and sponsor the sale. The committee went on record as complimenting highly Mr. William Fridgen, advertising manager of Smallman's Limited, for originating and promoting the idea of "Santa Claus Lane."

INCREASING DEMAND FOR LINSEED OIL

In view of the increased demand for oil flax products, growers in Western Canada are being encouraged to retain their own seed and increase their acreage, according to a report from the Canada Department of Agriculture's Production Service at Ottawa.

POTASH SUPPLIES AFFECTED BY KOREAN WAR

Importers of French potash into Canada have advised that shortage of ocean shipping space, caused by the unsettled international situation and particularly the Korean war, has delayed the entry into Canada of French potash contracted for several months ago.
