1666 Great Fire Of London Recalled On Anniversary
 By CARL MOLLINS
 LONDON (CP)—The calamity, the English parson told his congregation after the great fire of London, "was occasioned by the sin of gluttony, for it began at Pudding Lane and ended at Pie Corner."
 The fire that razed the City of London in a September week 300 years ago seemed too malicious in its devastation to be accepted at the time merely as an aimless catastrophe.
 Following the great plague that took 36,538 London lives the previous year, the fire of Sept. 2-9, 1666, caused only four-known deaths by burning. But shock or exposure killed unknown numbers among the 100,000 Londoners left homeless and hungry on suburban floors.
 Pushed by an easterly wind from its start in a Pudding Lane bakehouse near the end of London Bridge, the fire rushed through 400 narrow streets, for it began at Pudding Lane and ended at Pie Corner.
 The search for an explanation scoured up a flock of scapegoats and provoked a great post-mortem controversy.
 England was at war with Holland. Religious suspicion was rife just 17 years after Oliver Cromwell's Puritans had killed the Catholic Charles I and six years after the monarchy was restored under the nominally Protestant Charles II, whose brother and heir James was a Catholic.
 Foreigners of any kind were beaten in the burning streets. Protestants accused Catholics of starting the fire. Catholics said the fire was holy retribution for London's Protestant heresy.
WATCHMAKER HANGED
 Robert Hubert, a deranged French watchmaker described by diarist Samuel Pepys as "a mopish, bearded fellow," was hanged on Tyburn Tree for the alleged arson, but only after he had confessed successive confessions until they finally almost fitted the known facts.
 The king's firework-maker, a French Catholic named Bailand, came under suspicion and was said to have had hostile citizens to sanctuary inside the canopy bed of an aristocratic patron, Lady Killigrew of Whitehall.
 For other Puritans, the fire was divine punishment. But the person who blamed gluttony was at least partly mistaken.
 The fire did break out in Pudding Lane in the bakehouse of a man named Farvor at about 1 p.m. on Sunday, Sept. 2. But at Pie Corner, a mile to the northwest, the fire was only checked, not halted, on the Wednesday.
 A statue of a fat little boy still stands on the corner, though it no longer bears the inscription that once proclaimed: "This boy is put up in memory of the late fire of London occasioned by the sin of gluttony in 1666."
SOME BLAMED CHURCH
 Some serious were the accusations of a popish plot. These persisted even after a parliamentary committee concluded in January, 1667, that "nothing hath yet been found to argue the fire to have been other than the hand of God upon us, a great wind, and the season so very dry."
 Fifteen years after the fire, the pedestal of the 202-foot Doric column raised by Sir Christopher Wren as a memorial to a monument bore the inscription that the fire was "begun and carried on by the treachery and malice of the popish faction." The charge was erased after Catholic James II succeeded in 1685, was carved again when he was deposed in 1688 and was obliterated finally only in 1831.
 Other consequences were more beneficial to London and the world—insurance and fire brigades, for example.
 The unrecoverable material losses were worked out by an assiduous 17th-century accountant at more than £10,000,000, a staggering fortune in those days. Insurance terms began to be set up as the city was rebuilt—this time of brick and stone under royal order, Nicholas Barbon, a go-ahead young merchant, established the first effective form of insurance in 1680.
FORMED BRIGADES
 Within 40 years of the great fire, insurance companies began protecting their premiums with company fire brigades, the first in the world. Insured buildings were fixed with a company plaque—a sun, a thistle, a phoenix, clasped hands to show each brigade which property to save.
 The conclusion of firefighting—sometimes known to ignore a burning building if it bore a rival company's plaque—finally combined as a single force in 1832 and became a municipal brigade in 1866. London insurance companies still contribute to the costs of the London fire brigade.
