scrofula

Any doctor will tell you that Professor Hare, of Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, is one of the highest authorities in the world on the action of drugs. In his last work, speaking of the treatment of scrofula, he says: "It is hardly necessary to state that cod-liver oil is the best remedy of all. The oil should be given in emulsion, so prepared as to be palatable."

He also says that the hypophosphites should be combined with the oil.

Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver oil, with hypophosphites, is precisely such a preparation.

THE TRAMP AT THE DOOR.

By Mrs. M. L. Rayne.

He came to the back door, which he opened without the ceremony of a knock, and entered the summer kitchen of the house to find it cold and unoccupied. As no sign of the house being greeted by his knock, he kept on and climbed a short flight of terrestrial stairs where dilapidated saucers and other culinary utensils had been haphazardly abandoned. He knocked at the second closed door which confronted him and was almost immediately after faced by the entire household.

For his coming had not been unobserved. Everybody was there to meet him, but nobody was there to greet him—not at least with a kindly welcome. The several pairs of feminine eyes focused upon him expressed various degrees of wrath, fear, contempt and repulsion. The mistress of the house was young and pretty, but her face was set like a flint. Yet she had the kindest heart in the world. But when the tramp asked her for a bite and she handed him the cold and unappetizing food, she was not less kind. The forks and spoons in that family were genuine and heirlooms, so the tramp ate his breakfast in the primitive fashion which he obtained before knives and forks were invented. He seemed to have refined instincts in table etiquette, and the egg, which was soft-boiled, he ate with a spoon. He was embarrassed, too, to eat with the mistress of the house watching him. It was most embarrassing to have her suddenly ask: "Why are you a tramp?"

"I can't get work, ma'am." "Have you tried any?" "Yes." "Look at my hands!" She started back, for being versed in the social fallacy of palmistry she read in the lines she showed her the story of failure and defeat, and saw a life-line broken rudely early had reached half its natural limit. "Where did you sleep last night?" "In the station in the town beyond."

Again she thought of the silver, and half closed the door which she held as a barrier between them. This she did in her kind, who was making a paper napkin from a torn sheet lying near. It struck the young hostess forcibly that her guest was consistent with her surroundings. He was sitting from a broad-board laid over a four-barrel, his implements being the tea servants that wait on man—his fingers.

"It was my first night in the station-house," he continued apologetically. "I had money of my own until last week—enough to buy lodgings. It being the holidays, it's hard to get work. Have you any work I can do to pay for my breakfast?" She wanted to test him and prove that he was lazy and worthless, so that her conscience might never reproach her judgment, and she bid him carry a large bundle to the attic, a distance of three flights of stairs.

"I can't do it, ma'am." She noticed that he didn't say "lady," as professional tramps do. "I am too weak from want of regular food to lift or carry anything heavy, but I could do light chores. I can carry coal or empty ashcans, or clean—the silver." There was a sparkle of caustic mirth—it could hardly be called impudence—in his black-luster eyes, and his hostess actually shrank in alarm at his suggestion. "You are welcome to your breakfast," she said coldly, and moved as if to close the door.

struggled manfully to bear the burdens fate had decreed should be his, and he proudly declared that "it was not often they went hungry, and then only for a few days, when rent fell due." He had earned $3, almost a dollar of which they had saved for rent. And as he left him the lines of care and thought already drawn about the face that had not yet lost the innocence of a baby, the mother and suffering that he must early in the morning of life do the work that belongs to his middle hours, and the joy of living on the wages of his own hands, and the happiness of saving a few cents, made him look in a new way upon the little fellows who, running around corners, darting into street cars and dodging between passers by upon the streets, try to keep the public informed and themselves from starving.—Washington Star.

A scene was witnessed in the court of the local magistrate at Berlinchen, in the Mark, a few days ago, which would give evidence, that the accused, who was also a woman, started up and screamed out excitedly, "I object to this trial." The judge asked her reason. "That woman, Herr Richter," said the defendant, "swears whatever she pleases, and takes no harm by it. The woman that says she is a witness, she says a lie upon her breast, and then tells you she is without a breast. When she goes out of court she will throw the lie upon her breast, rather than false witness will hurt her soul."

The accused had scarcely ended her exposition of this odd doctrine of the law when the witness cried out, "I have not a particle of salt about me." And hereupon this Prussian Emperor, like her head; she tore open her dress, exposed her full breast to the court and invited the judge to see for himself whether she was taking any such precaution to absolve her soul from the guilt of perjury. The judge had hard work to quiet the two angry ladies, one of whom loudly affirmed, and the other as loudly denied, the presence of salt somewhere.—Notes and Queries.

Fun in a Palace. A very comical incident which made the German Emperor laugh until the tears rolled down his cheeks, is reported from the Berlin court. His youngest child, the princess, who was being dressed, during the afternoon, was being dressed, and the lady in waiting, being somewhat sleepy herself, did not think of dressing the child in time, and the Emperor, who was as much as possible. The Empress, coming into the room while the child still stood on a chair next to her bed, wanted to embrace and kiss the child, but as she put her on the floor the little one fell down and cried. The doctor was called at once by telephone, and pronounced it immediately a case of paralytic stroke. He gave orders to undress the child, in order to be able to find out whether it was the right or the left side which was paralyzed. With trembling hands the imperial mother herself began to undress her daughter, when she suddenly gave an exclamation of mingled surprise and joy—the sleepy lady in waiting had placed both legs of the little princess into one side of an unexpressed bifurcated garment.

We Do Not Exercise Enough. Mr. William Blake in one of his stimulating and entertaining talks about physical exercise remarks that running is a lost art among American women. "It is said that they run just fast enough for a man to catch them, but I have seen some that could not run that fast. They cannot run gracefully." Mr. Blake here told about how the girls at the gymnasium footed. Girls are weak in their arms. If they do not believe this let them try to raise themselves on a bar till their chin rests on their hands. For good brain exercise, "What are you doing?" "Playing tennis." "But I heard you calling names." "Yes, in 'We're playing we're the Senate.'"—Washington Star.

Parents Must Have Rest. A President of one of our Colleges says: "We spent many sleepless nights in consequence of our children suffering from colds, but this never occurs now: We use Scott's Emulsion, and it quickly relieves pulmonary troubles."
