Planning Seen Active In Canadian Business

By FORBES RHUDE
Canadian Press Business Editor

Canadian business, viewing last week's cabinet changes, may be wondering whether we are on the road to a more planned economy.

A German banker, commenting recently on his country's philosophy, said government sets the "flavor" or "framework:" business makes the decisions; but the government "prods" business if the decisions don't add up to national prosperity.

Whatever our own government has been doing, or will do, in setting the "flavor" or "prodding," business certainly is making a lot of decisions these days.

The most publicized decisions centre around "take-overs" or attempted "take-overs" of one business by another—some by mutual consent, but some strongly objected to by the party being taken over.

Less publicized decisions are those by which business is increasing efficiency, or creating new products, to compete in today's trade world.

Canadian planning would be faced with a number of problems that are much more pronounced here than in the more mature European economies.

We probably would have to make serious decisions not only regarding over-all national objectives, but regarding the lines of activity in which our competitive capacities would best enable us to reach those objectives.

Accordingly, though we can learn from the private - enterprise-oriented philosophy of Germany and the national-planning philosophy of France, we will have to find some peculiarly Canadian answers.

The word "planning," used in a national sense, used to be a "bad" word in business circles because of its socialist connotations, and business might still prefer another word. However, business spokesmen are not afraid to use it these days.

PLANNING STRESSED

The appointment to the cabinet of M. Wallace McCutcheon, Toronto financier, reminded many that his fellow financier, E. P. Taylor, favored more national planning in his address to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce at Halifax last fall.

In that address Mr. Taylor advocated a new approach in the relationship among government, business and labor and suggested consideration of a new ministry, perhaps of economic affairs.

On the take-over front last week the highlight was the rejection by directors of Canadian Oil Companies Ltd. of a $114,000,000 bid for the company by Shell Oil interests. Canadian Oil is considering "expressions of interest" from other sources but apparently hopes that, whatever deal it may enter into, the company will remain majority Canadian controlled.

HISTORIC PATH

Another development last week, widely-acclaimed as historic, was settlement of the contract dispute between Canadian railways and their 100,000 non-operating employees.

The important development here was the setting up of a fund, to be administered jointly by railways and unions, from which compensation will be paid to long-time employees who lose their jobs for reasons of automation or technological change.

The Canadian Association of Purchasing Agents says its July survey showed a tendency towards a levelling-off in manufacturing and processing industries.

It adds: "While new orders and production increased, the rate of improvement over the previous month was less than that recorded for the last several months. Employment rose, as did inventories. Prices continued up as more importers passed on higher costs."

PM Rejects Argument On Senate Naming

OTTAWA (CP)—Prime Minister Diefenbaker has firmly rejected an argument that it is constitutionally improper for a minority government to appoint a senator before it wins a vote of confidence in the Commons.

A leading exponent of this theory is Dr. Eugene Forsey, the articulate research director of the Canadian Labor Congress who raised it July 13 in a letter to the editor of the Ottawa Journal.

Wrote Dr. Forsey: "It would seem that any recommendations for senatorships or judgeships or other appointments of the sort by the present government before it has been sustained in Parliament would be of very dubious constitutional propriety."

Mr. Diefenbaker, whose Progressive Conservatives won the largest single bloc of Commons seats but short of a clear majority in the June 18 federal election, now has named M. Wallace McCutcheon of Toronto to the Senate, clearly rejecting the Forsey argument.

AWARE OF ARGUMENT

The prime minister certainly was aware of the argument against senatorial appointments before he won a vote of confidence in the House.

He had known about it as early as 1957 when he named eight senators after assuming office with a minority government and before Parliament was called into session.

It could be argued in the case of the 1957 appointments that the Conservatives were clearly on the rise politically, having won the largest single Commons bloc in turning out the Liberal administration of Louis St. Laurent.

Conversely, it might be argued that in 1962 Conservative fortunes were on the wane, the party having dropped from the largest Commons majority in Canadian history to a minority position.

However, government experts say it isn't where you've been politically, or where you're going, that counts. It's where you are and, in this case, the Conservatives are in office as the governing party just as they were in 1957.

REFERS TO KING

Dr. Forsey maintains that two former prime ministers, Mackenzie King and Arthur Meighen, "followed the constitutionally correct course" in 1926. He says Mr. King made no senatorial appointments until given a vote of confidence in the House and Mr. Meighen made none at all during his 100 days in office.

However, an examination of Senate records shows that Mr. King—returned to office with a minority in the Sept. 14, 1926, election—appointed Paul L. Hatfield of Nova Scotia to the Senate on Oct. 7, 1926. Parliament did not meet until Dec. 9, 1926.

Still further precedent exists in 1921 when Mr. King replaced Mr. Meighen's Unionist government without a Commons majority and appointed Arthur Hardy of Brockville, Ont., to the Senate Feb. 10, 1922, a month before Parliament met.

Senator McCutcheon's appointment leaves the Senate standings at: Conservatives 36, Liberals 62, Independents 2, Independent-Liberal 1, vacant 11.

The bidding:

South	West	North	East
1♦	Dble.	Pass	1♥
3♣	3♥	4♦	4♥
5♦	Dbls.

Opening lead—ace of hearts.

The opening lead has a great bearing on the result of many hands.

This deal was played in the match between Australia and the United States during the World Olympiad in Turin in 1960. The hand is notable not only for what happened, but for what did not happen.

When an Australian pair held the North-South cards, the bidding went as shown in the diagram. The American West led the ace of hearts against five diamonds doubled.

Declarer ruffed, drew four rounds of trumps, and played the king of spades. West took the ace, but his return did not matter. South made the contract, losing only a spade and a club for a net plus of 550 points.

At the second table, with an American pair now holding the North-South cards, the bidding went:

South	West	North	East
1♦	Dble.	Pass	1♥
3♣	3♥	3NT	4♥
Pass	Pass	5♦	Pass
Pass	Dble.

The Australian West (Schaufelberger) led the ace of spades. This turned out exceptionally well for him because, when partner showed out, West continued with a low spade which East ruffed.

East returned a club to the ace, and another spade lead then brought another ruff to defeat the contract two tricks (300 points). So the outcome was that Australia gained 850 points on the deal.

Obviously, Schaufelberger's opening lead was more effective than his counterpart's opening lead at the other table. In fact, it was 850 points more effective, and that can hardly be called tin.

In a sense, though, the outcome of the hand at the two tables was regrettable because neither East - West pair saw fit to carry the bidding to five hearts.

That contract would have been extremely interesting to play and would have brought a most unusual situation. But that story will have to go over to tomorrow's column.

DAILY CRYPTOQUOTE — Here's how to work it:

A X Y D L B A A X R
is L O N G F E L L O W

One letter simply stands for another. In this sample A is used for the three L's, X for the two O's, etc. Single letters, apostrophies, the length and formation of the words are all hints. Each day the code letters are different.
