ATLANTA Constitution:—After all, the money made by farming is the cleanest, best money in the world. It is made in accordance with God's first law, under honest and genial influences, away from the taint of trade or the fierce heat of speculation. It fills the pockets of the farmer at the expense of no other man. His gain is no man's loss; but the more he makes the better for the world at large. Prosperous farmers make a prosperous people. Whatever benefits our agriculture benefits the commonwealth.

On your limited space we are unable to furnish our readers with a report of the last evening's City Council proceedings. The business transacted might be summarized as follows: A demand made by the City School Board for funds was laid on the table; the teachers' delegation was heard, and the Mayor's Committee's action confirmed; the Mayor was requested to call a meeting of citizens for Monday night, to discuss the financial situation; and councillor Chappelle made an unsuccessful attempt to reduce the Mayor's salary to $5 per annum.

Home Rule.

THE PROSPECTS OF SECURING IT FROM THE LIBERAL PARTY—OPINIONS OF TWO PROMINENT STATESMEN—LORD DERBY WARNS MR. GLADSTONE AGAINST "VAQUE PROMISES"—MR. FORSTER ENDORSES LORD DERBY.

The following remarks are from Lord Derby's Manchester speech:—"It is the Land League, not the Land Act, which has closed English purses against Irish investments, and if—which we may hope, though it is scarcely safe to predict it confidently—if what Parliament has done ends to check agitation in the future, that is the first step towards restoring confidence and developing industry. It will be, at the best, a long business, but I believe we shall win in the end—if, on the one hand, we hold ourselves ready to deal with real grievances; and if on the other, we absolutely refuse to listen for an hour to the claim of Irish nationality in whatever disguise or form. 'Home Rule' may mean anything or nothing; but if it means an Irish Parliament sitting in Dublin I am as fully convinced that an Irish Parliament involves ultimate separation as I am that two and two make four. (Here, here.) You may tell me that this is not a practical question. Well, I hope that it is not; but if we do not want it to become a practical question we must be careful to abstain from giving vague pledges which will be construed to mean a good deal more than they do. (Hear, hear.)"

The following are Mr. Forster's remarks at Glasgow on the 14th:—"Lord Derby in a very few words said last night:—'Home rule may mean anything or nothing, but if it means an Irish Parliament sitting in Dublin, I am as fully convinced that an Irish Parliament involves ultimate separation as I am that two and two make four. That what it involves—absolute separation, the great probability of civil war in Ireland, the certainty of jealousy and conflict between the two countries, and, in reply to that, the expulsion of Irishmen from the advantages of belonging to our empire and our colonies, and from India. We offer Irishmen a share in the greatest empire that the world ever saw—('hear, hear, and cheers)—and my belief is that that offer, notwithstanding all the speeches and all the writings and all the agitation that we now see, will at last be accepted in Ireland as it has been accepted in Scotland. (Cheers.) Out of kindness and justice to Ireland we must make clearly known what is the undoubted fact—that England and Scotland are against any dissolution of the union—(loud cheers)—that that union must, at all hazards, be maintained—(cheers)—and that any Government would be hurled from power immediately that dandered with the question—(cheers)—and, on the other hand, that we should continue the measures of justice to Ireland, of kindness to Ireland, of long suffering with Ireland, with the determination to make her one country with ourselves, with equal laws as much as it is possible to have them so. (Cheers.) And I believe we shall succeed. (Cheers.) You, members of this club, you and your compatriots have a much longer political life before you than I have. I believe you will live to see a real political union between the three kingdoms. (Cheers.) Events march fast in these times, and I am not sure that even I may not live to see it. (Cheers.)"

Personal—Gossip.

The following is an incident of Anthony Trollope's life:—He was in the small coffee-room of a wayside inn warming his back at the fire, after the manner of Englishmen. Two youths of the true novel-reading age were seated at an adjacent table discussing mutton chops, but still more eagerly discussing the merits of Trollope's novels of the Barsetshire period. Their summing up was decidedly favorable and eulogistic, save on one point. They both agreed in declaring themselves heartily sick and tired "of that eternal Mrs. Proudie." At this juncture, with a gesture of his arm, Anthony Trollope interrupted by saying, "Gentlemen, I happen to be the author of those novels, and I have overheard all you have said; and now I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll go home and kill Mrs. Proudie!" And he was as good as his word, for in the very next number of "The Last Chronicles of Barset" she died suddenly in a fit of apoplexy.

The Paris Temps, moralising on Mr. Gladstone's jubilee, says:—"Fifty years of a scarcely interrupted Parliamentary career—England alone, that country of tradition, of governmental and social stability, can offer such a spectacle. The annals of the French Parliamentary system presents nothing like it, for the three statesmen who in this century in our country have had the longest political careers, M. Guizot, M. Thiers and M. Dufaure, had their activity arrested or suspended by the long interregnum of the Empire. What lessons of political science, what Ministerial and Parliamentary experience a man must acquire in half a century of uninterrupted activity. What communion of sentiments and ideas must be established by this continuity between electors and their representatives. And how justified we are in looking on this example with an envious eye—we, whose political development has every twenty years a revolution or coup de force, breaking one of the links of its chain, and with whom every fresh generation claims to date the history of civilization from its own coming of age, and is bent on rebuilding its predecessors' work on new foundations.

Mr. Gladstone's visits to the London theatres are becoming quite political events. Whenever he has carried any great bill he betakes himself to the theatre. Sometimes it is the Toole's theatre that he patronizes; sometimes it is the aesthetic Irving and a revival that attracts him. He was one of the first-nighters at "Iolanthe," and laughed consummately at the Chancellor and the Peers. Is he merely seeking relaxation, or is he trying to find out which way the wind blows? Is he looking for applause for the past, or prospecting for the future? Perhaps if "Iolanthe" had been a success he would have abolished the House of Lords. As it is not a brilliant success, he will spare that venerable body a little longer, and meanwhile take Lord Derby into his Ministry. Napoleon the Great was the first in modern times to see that the stage could be turned to political uses. He ordered lines to be inserted that favored his own views, and made the actors the mouthpiece of the Government. When he was busy with his plan of invading England he ordered the Theatre Francaise to produce Duval's "William the Conqueror," but after one night it was withdrawn as being too royalist. He prohibited the playing of "The Stranger," not because it is dreary, but because it speaks well of the Dutch Republic.
