Britain and the United States are in a hot race to build the first atom-powered airplane. And the first successful flight may not be far off, according to an article in this week's Star Weekly. Atomic power is now turning electric generators in Britain. An atomic power unit would be a small, compact affair, but it would require a fifty-ton steel shield for protection from atomic reaction, which is just one of the engineering problems presented. It's coming and according to the Star Weekly writer, atom-powered planes may become the main transport of the world.
