Physicians

prescribe Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites because they find their patients can tolerate it for a long time, as it does not upset the stomach nor derange the digestion like the plain oil.

Scott's Emulsion is as much easier to digest than the plain oil as milk is easier to digest than butter. Besides, the fish-fat taste is taken out of the oil, and it is almost palatable. The way sickly children, emaciated, anæmic and consumptive adults, gain flesh on Scott's Emulsion is very remarkable.

THE FIVE-STRINGED BANJO.

Miss Josephine Bannister, daughter of the well-known music seller at Seacliff, was a highly attractive, if a rather pert young lady, whose good looks were the source of much male custom to her father's shop. You should have seen her in her neat, tailor-made costume, rolling up music with her white, bejewelled hands, and flirting vigorously with her gentleman customers. She was a sight for the gods—not for the goddesses, though. No female, human or divine, could ever have been found to say a good word for Miss Josephine. Ladies in Seacliff had even been heard to allude to her as a "minx" and to deplore the infatuation which led young men to desert charming girls of their own station for the vulgar sniggerings of that shop girl on the Parade. This criticism, however, was not without prejudice, for the ladies who made these remarks liked a flirtation themselves, and had it, too—when they could get it—which was not, however, always, for in Seacliff the ladies outnumbered the gentlemen by nearly two to one.

But, although Miss Josephine flirted indiscriminately with every man she met, simply because "it was her nature to," and she couldn't help it, she had a small coterie of admirers, whom she treated with particular favor. This coterie consisted of five young men, and some wag, with more wit than was usually to be found in the Seacliff humorists, had evolved for her the punning and appropriate nickname of the "Five-stringed Banjo."

Oh, that silver string! How truly divine was its music. Many other ladies beside Miss Josephine had come under its bewitching influence. The first time it intoned the prayers in Seacliff Parish church a gross and a half of feminine devotees bowed the head and worshipped. Before the sermon was half finished that Sunday, 200 tender hearts were fluttering inside an equal number of small summer blouses. 'Twas merely the new curate's voice—not merely his looks—not merely the graceful hang of his surplice, not the sublime set of his stole—not merely the righteous fervor of his roaming eye—these, indeed, had their fascination in the man himself, which no male mind could appreciate, and no female heart resist.

When it became noted—and you may be sure that this didn't take long in a place like Seacliff—that the Reverend Brabazon A. B. C. Flitch was constantly buying music in the shop on the Parade, the ladies of the place grew very angry.

Now, if there was a girl in the place (excluding, for the moment, the five-stringed banjo) to whom the curate could be said to pay attention, that girl was Tishy Bullock. Her full name was Letitia, and she was the daughter of a wealthy widow, who lived in a large house just outside the town. Tishy was a pretty girl, considerably prettier than her name, either in its long or its shortened form. She was an only child—the future heiress, under settlement of her mother's money. The curate began by being polite to her. He was—there is no doubt about it, though it occurred in the modest society of Seacliff—in fact, encouraged to be more than polite. You see, Tishy didn't want money. She did want birth, refinement, a sympathetic helpmeet. And what man better fulfilled these requirements than Brabazon Flitch? To one Bullock's banking account add one Flitch's blood and birth. What was the answer? Tishy totted up the sum and found it came to social success. Mrs. Bullock checked her figures and pronounced them correct. The result was that Brabazon Flitch became conspicuously persona grata at Westcombe House.

This, of course, excited remark in Seacliff. People soon had still more interesting news to gossip about. Brabazon Flitch had been seen coming out of the five-stringed banjo's father's private door, and the five-stringed banjo's father had followed him on to the step, with a red face and a choleric demeanor. The inference was obvious. Brabazon Flitch had been called to account by Bannister senior for trifling with his daughter's affections, and whatever explanation he might have given of his conduct had clearly not satisfied the indignant father. In church next Sunday Brabazon was observed to be nervous and depressed. On the left of the middle aisle, where the ladies sat many eyes shone with watery sympathy. Tishy was observed to turn pale; Mrs. Bullock got her smelling salts ready in case she should faint away.

At present other people only surmised and guessed the facts. Tishy and her mother knew them—from Brabazon's own lips. The previous day he had called at Westcombe House, and, discarding all reserve and false modesty, had poured the whole story of his trouble into Mrs. Bullock's sympathetic ear. He had been a little fool-ish—he owned—to have gone so frequently to Bannister's shop. He had—yes, he had been attracted, just at first, by Miss Bannister's superficial beauty, and, no doubt, he had talked to her more than was prudent. Then he had a hint from a kind friend that his visits to the music shop were getting talked about. He at once discontinued these visits. And what had been his reward? He had been summoned by her father to an interview, in which he (the father) had adopted a high-handed, bullying tone; had demanded whether he meant to marry his daughter—whom he would as soon have thought of marrying as of flying over the moon.

He (Brabazon) was quite at his wits' end to know what to do. The girl's father had given him a week to decide in, and the week expired next Monday. Unless by that day he received from Brabazon a written undertaking to marry Josephine, he should not only take the first opportunity of assaulting the curate in the street, but proceedings would immediately be instituted to recover damages from him by law.

"Either of these steps would be fatal to me," said the unhappy curate, "and both together would simply crush me. If you, dear friend, could advise me what to do for the best, you would lay me under an eternal obligation."

"It is a shameful, scandalous conspiracy," exclaimed Tishy's mother with indignation. "I should be disposed to—to—simply defy the wretch."

"But think what that would mean, dear friend. A layman might take this course, no doubt. But a minister of God—how is he to face it? The mere fact of having such accusation publicly brought against him is sufficient to ruin him, even though they be not substantiated. And these people, having gone so far already, will not, I believe, hesitate to perjure themselves in support of their wicked claim."

"Yet what else can be done?" answered Mrs. Bullock, with a perplexed look. "If you do not defy him, you must give in to him and marry that hussy, his daughter, which would be still more deplorable."

"Alas! I am afraid, dearest lady, that I am between the dev—hem—on the horns of a dilemma," the curate hastened to correct himself. "But I could not—could not marry that girl, if for no other reason, because—because——"

He broke off suddenly, looking confused and embarrassed.

"Pray do not hesitate to confide in me," said Tishy's mother gently.

"My dearest friend," said Brabazon, suddenly, speaking with determination and resolve, like a man who had made up his mind to a bold course, "I feel I have no right to conceal this thing from you. I never meant to have told it to anybody. It was to be a secret locked up in this bosom, because—because——" The curate dropped his eyes and lowered his voice humbly. "I knew that I was unworthy to mention it to—to—her whom it chiefly concerns. But you have spoken so kindly to me in my trouble, dear lady, that—I cannot but confide the truth to you. Spurn me, ridicule me, if you will. It will only be what I deserve. I—I—God help me to bear my cross and to recognize the futility of my suit. I—I—love your daughter!"

"Oh, Mr. Flitch," cried out the lady, extending both her hands to him, and smiling joyfully into his face. "Don't speak of unworthiness—of—of—futility. You have made me the happiest woman but one in the world. For I am convinced that dear Tishy alone will be happier about this than I am."

"But, alas, dear lady," said the curate, a cloud overspreading the radiant felicity which had, for the moment, shone in his face. "Remember how I am placed. I—I could not subject that angel to the shame of marrying a publicly disgraced man."

"Pray do not talk like that, my dear Mr.—may I say Brabazon? You have done nothing wrong. Therefore you have incurred no real disgrace."

"But the shame of a—a—public trial—of a—a—cruel exposure!" murmured the unhappy priest, with a miserable look.

"Perhaps that may be avoided," answered Mrs. Bullock, after a brief reflection. "Of course these wretches are mercenary. They must be, else they would never threaten to sue you for damages. I have no doubt that we can buy them off. Don't you suppose so?"

"If I could offer them a large sum of money they might accept it as satisfaction," answered Brabazon, rather dubiously. Then he added: "But I need not think about that; for I have not the money to offer them."

"Brabazon," said Mrs. Bullock, who, with all her faults, was a generous woman at heart, and had more delicacy of feeling than might have been expected, "Do not be offended my—my boy, at what I am going to say. I look upon you as my—my son now, you know. And it would be hard, indeed, if a mother might not help her son out of a scrape. You must—must—let me find the money for this purpose."

"Oh, I could not—I could not!" exclaimed Brabazon, evidently overcome by her generous offer.

"But you must," insisted Tishy's mother, with gentle firmness.

"People would—would—think—think me—me—contemptible for thus sponging on you," said the curate. "Besides, if—if those—those people knew they were treating with a—a rich person, they would—would make the most extortionate demands."

"There is no reason why they, or any one else, should know of my connection with the affair," replied Mrs. Bullock. "You shall conduct all the negotiations, and the money shall be paid through you."

Still Brabazon's scruples were not overcome. He resisted the generous proposal a little longer. Mrs. Bullock, however, determined woman that she was, would have her way. And the curate—half relieved, half ashamed, and wholly embarrassed by her kindness—at length consented to accept her help—for Tishy's sake.

Bannister senior would not accept any less than £1,000. Neither argument nor entreaty on Brabazon's part could induce him to abate those terms. The curate went to Mrs. Bullock, with tears in his eyes, and told her of the extortionate demand. She was not daunted, but at once drew him a check for the amount. Next day curate—and cash—quit Seacliff.—London Truth.

An Australian Court Anecdote.

The stories of early Australian judges are numerous and incredible. The following incident, which is vouched for as a fact, is of a judge who had a lofty idea of his own legal capacity, and was at the same time anxious to sustain the dignity of his court. A "shooting case" came before him. There was no direct evidence as to who was the perpetrator of the murder, but the individual arrested was well known, and indeed confessed the deed. When brought into court, the judge cautioned the prisoner that he must remember his rights as a free citizen and that, above all things, he must not interrupt the proceedings of the court. After this friendly warning the judge proceeded to state that he, the prisoner, was accused of having, on such a date, shot the deceased. Upon this the prisoner broke in, "Well, an' so I did."

The judge was annoyed at the interruption. "Hold your tongue, sir!" he exclaimed. "Haven't I told you not to commit yourself, nor to interrupt me? I shall commit you for contempt of court if you do so again!" he added sternly. He then repeated the accusation, upon which the prisoner broke in:

"I have told you afore that I killed—"

The judge's indignation was intense at this second interruption, and he demanded: "Mr. Sheriff, what is your evidence?"

"I have nothing but circumstantial evidence, your Honor, and the prisoner's own confession."

"Then," said the judge, "I discharge the prisoner on this accusation, but commit him for contempt of court."—Household Words.

The Reason . .

Good health cannot be enjoyed when the nerves are in a deranged condition is because other organs of the body do not receive their natural supply of nerve fluid. The nerve centre is situated near the base of the brain, and when nerve food is cut off the isolated part loses its functional power.

IN THE TREATY PORTS.

A Canadian Product Finds Favor in the Land of Confucius.

VANCOUVER (Special) Oct. 14.—A passenger by the last vessel from China stated the other day that among other Canadian products which are fast coming into favor in the Chinese treaty ports, is the Canadian specific remedy for kidney diseases of all kinds known as Dodd's Kidney Pills. The medicine was first introduced by Canadians and the increase in its use both by Europeans and natives is attributed first to the accounts of its success in the Canadian and American newspapers, many of which are received in Shanghai and other ports, and later to its established efficacy in curing all kinds of kidney diseases, which are very prevalent in the country.

A Child Born Near the North Pole.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 10.—An American baby has been born on Hirshel Island, in the far north. In all likelihood a baby never saw the light of day on Hirshel Island before. It is the offspring of Mrs. Sherman, whose husband is captain of the whaler Beluga. The island lies north of the boundary line, being the extreme northern portion of Alaska. If it were possible to follow an air-line from Sitka to Hirshel Island, the traveller would have to journey 1500 miles straight north before he could see the bold headlines of the Island.
