ELLEN'S DIARY

A Church Supper Is Something To Remember!

The varied weather of today gave rise to mixed endeavours on the farm in the morning, beclouded softly and threaded with the seasonal calls of the bluejays, the threshing was continued at Rob's until nearing mid-day an expected shower wrote "Finis" to all work of the field for the day.

Soon however, the farmers excursion fieldward this time to inspect the herd of young cattle on pasture, to see how much those summer-fattened and destined for an autumn market had gained and to make selections of those to be kept on, in the best interests of the farming we do.

"There never was better pasture than that of this summer," the younger farmer reported later. "The stock did well E's amazing how much those feeders we bought last spring have gained—perhaps we notice them more than our own."

"Do you suppose it will rain again?" Granddaughter came by through the afternoon to ask with unnatural little-girl wistfulness. "You see" she explained "Granddaddy said this morning that if there was no threshing he would take up to that church supper."

So for this time the damp of an occasional light shower helped a little maid and lad—and we suspect in many an instance those of their elders as well, to have a wish of the moment realized.

And with them we attended, at the community hall in the adjacent district where run Rob's and "the other farm", a first supper of the season—a supper to which in home cooking the farmwives contribute the choicest of ferings of the culinary art to be tasteful and altogether delectable fare.

It was in generous supply and in a wide selection on the attractively spread tables. How toothsome the slices of turkey! And inviting and colorful the accompanying salads; piquant the new of the season's pickles and relishes, good the biscuits and rolls; the sweets too in a bewildering variety... and the pies.

We could fancy that some of the farmwives present, so busy these times with their much cooking, wished as did we on our own account, that they might have a corner of all this food handy at home during the autumn season of fieldwork! How convenient it would be. And how well appreciated then to the workers so hungry.

"I guess" Mach commented with a satisfied grin toward the end of his meal "I'll have to let out my belt a notch or two. I can't resist a piece of lemon pie."

So busy the cooks and waitresses were catering to the fine crowd that had congregated from near and far to enjoy not only the meal but also the social side of the event which gave folks an opportunity to greet and chat with those friends—and indeed neighbors, they meet all too seldom now in this changed and apparently more absorbing era of rural living.

A church supper—indeed every community supper is a many-sided event, something to be remembered long after, with pleasure by all.
