Charting New U.S. Policy Towards The Middle East

By GEORGE KITCHEN
 Canadian Press Staff Writer
 WASHINGTON (CP) — Behind the stout oaken doors of the state department, the United States is quietly charting a new policy to govern its conduct in the troubled, fermenting Middle East.
 Because of the domestic political ramifications of any shift in foreign policy, the full portents of the new U.S. strategy may not become apparent until after the Nov. 6 general election. Even then, it may appear only through a series of diplomatic manoeuvres aimed at gradually altering the emphasis of U.S. policy in the Mediterranean.

coming at a time when the Egyptians advised that they were ready to accept it, was regarded in diplomatic circles here as a grave policy decision fraught with an array of grave possibilities for the U.S. position in the Middle East.

The first phase of this changing line came last week when State Secretary Dulles with the obvious approval of President Eisenhower, decided to withdraw the American offer to help Egypt build its cherished $1,300,000,000 high dam at Aswan of the Nile. The decision was regarded here as a sharp diplomatic slap at Gamal Abdel Nasser, president of Egypt and leader of the turbulent Arab world, and the launching of a get-tough policy towards the Egyptians and the other Arab nations.

The build-up for this rebuff, which amounted to a diplomatic rap on the knuckles for the Egyptians for the way they have courted favor with the Russians, came a few days earlier when the U.S. reshuffled its Middle East diplomatic force and pulled its ambassador, Henry A. Byroade, out of Cairo. Byroade, a U.S. army colonel, was considered to be a warm friend of Arab causes and a critic of the Israelis. It was little more than six months ago that the United States, seeking to win Egypt over to the Western side, offered Nasser a grant of $50,000,000 to get a start on the projected Aswan dam. The only string attached was that Egypt would accept no Communist assistance. The withdrawal of the offer,

P.E.I. FORESTRY
 At a recent meeting of the Maritime Section of the Canadian Institute of Forestry, held at the Experimental Farm, a very interesting paper was presented by Mr. G. Gaudet, Provincial Forester on P.E. Island. He gave a brief outline of what historians, authors and others have written concerning the forest area on the Island from Jacques Cartier's visit in 1534, on. He found the trees wonderfully fair, and mentioned a number of species that bore no fruit.

Thomas Rochon in 1759 referred to a grove of cedars in Prince County from the wood of which an incense was distilled. James B. Pollard described the "virgin forest" as a mixture of large conifers and deciduous trees with an undergrowth of hazel, smaller trees and brambles.

The Earl of Selkirk, who made an extensive tour over the Island, said that the country in its natural state was heavily timbered, with the exception of the salt marshes. He told of the settlers using fire to clear the land. Walter Johnstone, a surveyor, wrote: "P.E. Island is an entire forest of wood, except for the settlers' clearances." The forests were a mixture of what the natives called hard wood and soft wood, and there were a great variety of species of each. He named many, and referred to the pine and hemlock reaching a tremendous size, up to 80 feet in height and 3 1/2 feet in diameter.

SETTLERS' FIRES
 Mr. Gaudet mentioned that the settlers' fires had often run wild, destroying much of the original magnificent timber; so that our lumber today does not compare favourably with what was here in earlier times. He said that roughly one-third of the "million-acre farm" is wooded; and that most of this is privately owned; that the eastern and western sections are more heavily wooded than the central section. He said that in recent years nearly 6,000 cords of pulp-wood have been exported annually; that our woods are being overcut.

FOREST NURSERY
 Four years ago, the Forestry Division established a forest nursery to offset this depletion, where four kinds of pine, three kinds of spruce, larch, balsam fir and northern white cedar have been grown successfully near Beach Grove Inn. He mentioned that our native white spruce is dwarfed, limby and of poor quality. His belief is that it is hereditary, that the present stands have grown from the seed of line-fence spruce or trees that were left standing because they were fit neither for lumber nor pulpwood. The Division has imported white spruce seed for their nursery.

We can remember some magnificent stands of spruce, and recall cutting timber for a wharf in 1900, some of which would square a foot at over 30 feet, with scarce a limb to the height, and later, from our own woods at Bay View, we loaded two schooners with piles and sawn lumber that came from selected cuttings on less than 12 acres of spruce woods. The seed from such trees should be equal to anything that could be imported, however, we do not know of any similar stands of spruce today.

The Forestry Division has already planted over 150 acres of non-agricultural land, and are planting from 30 to 40 acres per year. There is a decided improvement in the attitude of our people towards the conservation of our soils and forests, and the woodlots that run from 10 acres to 300 acres, are gradually coming under better forest management, because of the object lessons of those who are managing their woodlots correctly, so that they may harvest a regular crop each year, now and in the future.

TREE FARMING
 Mr. J.H. Sewell, Forester in the N.B. Forest Service, read an excellent paper on "A Presentation of the Canadian Tree Farm Movement, and its Application in N.B." He referred to trees as "God's great gift to the race." They prepared the world for man's habitation. Their history is the history of our Dominion. "Canada is the forest country." He mentioned that one-third of British Columbia's revenue came from timber; two-thirds of Alberta and Saskatchewan can never by anything but forest land; three-quarters of Manitoba will remain in trees; two-thirds of Ontario can grow only timber; Quebec has only 100 million acres of agricultural land; three-quarters of the land in the Maritime Provinces has been set aside by nature for timber; two-thirds of Newfoundland is forest land. Thus only one-quarter of the land area of Canada can ever be used for agriculture, and one-half of the rest can grow timber.

Canada's original forest wealth was estimated at 925 billion cubic feet, recent estimates indicate that only about 45 per cent is left. To overcome this decline in natural resources, the Woodlot Committee of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association considered the Tree Farm Movement for Canada in 1948, and after investigation recommended that the Canadian Forestry Association should undertake the development of a Canadian Tree Farm system. In 1953, a committee was formed to do this, and there are now 302 certified Tree Farms, totalling 363,428 acres.

He gave illustrations from Tree Farms that had been dedicated to conservation, including fire protection: The 9,800-acre Tree Farm of the University of British Columbia expect to remove 4 million feet B.M. of wood per year in a continual thinning process. On these Tree Farms the trees are the crop that is to be maintained and harvested profitably, according to approved standards of Tree Farm practice.

Prof. H.D. Long of the University of New Brunswick, gave a paper on "Land Use from the Forestry Viewpoint." He said that abandoned farms gave evidence of mistakes made in land use in the past, that need not be repeated today, as modern soil science has given us the means of separating agricultural from non-agricultural land, and forestry has advanced so that different kinds of land are recognized and can be assigned to the production of certain forest crops. He described some of the differences in the characteristics of land suitable for forestry compared with that to be used for agriculture which may be determined chiefly by a soil survey, whereas in forestry a satisfactory site, which includes many factors, is of great importance among other requirements, soil depth and the nature of the subsoil are important for tree growth. Rocky soils may not be inferior for tree farms, and land with imperfect drainage may produce better crops of certain types of trees than land that is well drained. Soil surveys reports for agriculture are useful to the forester, particularly for normal upland soils. He, however, is often compelled to make additional subdivisions of the soil. It is necessary for the forester to manage his lands so that they regenerate the desired species. Forest crops do not deplete soil fertility like farm crops, as they return about 75 per cent of the nutrients through the annual litter that falls. Forest management should be so planned and executed that soil fertility is not impaired. Cutting should not produce soil erosion, and should help, rather than hinder, regeneration. Forests should be varied enough so that natural control factors are maintained that check the enemies of the forest. Over-stocking with trees should be avoided in order to give herbaceous and shrubby vegetation a chance to grow and produce healthier soil and forest conditions.

Hospital Insurance Scheme Unlikely Before April '58

By HAROLD MORRISON
 Canadian Press Staff Writer
 OTTAWA (CP)—Federal authorities have ruled out the possibility of a national hospital insurance scheme being launched before the spring of 1958.
 There had been some earlier prospects that the projected $325,000,000 plan might go into operation next year. But the provinces have been slow in reacting to the federal offer and the key ones—Ontario and Quebec—have reached no final decisions.
 The offer was made last January. The federal administration said it would pay half the cost of a national health insurance scheme starting with hospital care and diagnostic services.
 The offer was contingent on a majority of provinces representing a majority of the Canadian population joining the scheme. So far, only British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan have accepted.
 Federal officials said the scheme would work if any five provinces joined along with either Ontario or Quebec. They had some doubts as to whether Quebec would join but thought Ontario would.
 Premier Frost of Ontario has been a keen advocate of some form of health insurance but he said last March that he will allow no one to push his government into any such plan until there has been a complete analysis of details.

100,000,000 FIRST YEAR
 The scheme has some bearing on federal budget planning. Initial federal costs, if all provinces joined, would be about $100,000,000 in the first year of operation.
