THE NEWS IN SHORT METERS.

During 1897 only 1,537 miles of railway in the United States passed into the hands of a receiver. If this seems large it may be compared with 5,441 miles in 1896 or 20,356 miles in the record year of 1892. The railways sold under foreclosure of mortgage in 1897 were 42, aggregating 6 675 miles. In 1896 the number was 56 of 43,730 miles. The two longest roads that were sold on behalf of the bondholders were the Union Pacific, 1,822 miles, and the Utah Northern, 1,428 miles. In the first case the funded debt was $128,000,000 in the other $50,000,000. The Quinor, Omaha, and Kansas City, which was sold, had a funded debt of $33,500,000 on its 564 miles of line. In 22 years 110,022 miles of United States railway has passed into the hands of receivers, and nearly the same mileage has been sold under foreclosure.

The difficulty of dealing with newspaper reports of nuptial divorce cases has been solved in a very simple manner in England. The president of the court requests the reporters to withdraw and they do so, no one caring to make himself or his paper unpleasantly conspicuous by asserting his right to remain. In connection with this arrangement, some interesting correspondence has just passed between the president of the court and the press. Lord Jenne wrote:

"I wish to express my acknowledgments to the gentleman of the press for their withdrawal from the court at my request yesterday during the hearing of a particular case. They may be quite sure that never have made and never shall make such a request except on very rare occasions when in my judgment a distinct and serious injustice to public morality would result from the publication of proceedings."

The members of the press in reply, expressed their confidence in Judge Jenne's discretion, and so everything was as it should be, and everybody satisfied without any fuss—an example of English institutions at their best.

THE ENGLISH BUTTER MARKET.

A correspondent of the Elgin Dairy Report has been studying English tastes and demands and writes as follows:

It is a curious and profitable study to inquire, as I have done and recently, into the connection between the climate of England and Englishman's taste of butter. The facts, when they are generally known in America, should be a great assistance to the dairymen who are deeply interested in the big movement to supply the English market with American butter; for it is good business sense in foreign, as well as in domestic trade, to find out exactly what your prospective customer wants, and then give it to him.

Climate, more than any other influence, enters into the question of what a man eats and what he acquires a taste for. The mild and moist climate of England, and of all northern Europe, produces grasses that are watery and seem lacking in starch and sugar; but produce excellent juicy beef or mutton and butter that is very mild, almost colorless in summer as well as in winter, and which will consequently bear very little salt.

Now as I have said above, what a man eats he acquires a taste for, so when a person has been compelled all his life, as it were, to eat a butter very mild, and with little or no salt, you cannot expect him to appreciate a butter high in flavor and heavily salted, especially when aged a little or has been kept a little too long, as is generally the case with butter sent to England from America.

But here I might speak of the salt. You may ask, why do the English want so little salt? Simply because their butter being of so light a flavor it will bear but very little salt. So the taste is formed and must be catered to, and we again see the result of climate.

Now to verify these facts, I myself found after eating for a few weeks their child saltless butter, on my return home that our American butter quite to rank. But you ask how we are to make butter to suit the English? Simply by pasteurizing. We thus make a butter milder in flavor, of a better keeping quality and requiring at the same time less salt.

So far as my observation in London went the creamery butter that kept best, was rated highest in quality, sold for the highest price, was made in Denmark and Sweden, and was sold as Danish butter. This knowledge at once suggests inquiry into the Danish methods. The pasteurizing method of making butter is almost universally adopted in these countries. The commission of Denmark whom I met in Copenhagen, estimated that at least nine-tenths of the butter made is pasteurized. The process as it is carried on at the Sweden Agricultural college creamery is briefly described by the manager, Dr. Eugstrom, as follows:

"Only milk from the college farm is handled. The quantity received daily is from 200 to 500 gallons, and is on an average 370 gallons. The evening's milk is kept cool in a large vat during the night, and is skimmed together with the morning's milk. Before skimming the milk is pasteurized in a scalding to 200 degrees to 176 degrees Fahrenheit, and is skimmed hot. The cream is cooled in a cooler to 59 degrees Fahrenheit, and thereafter ice is used to 29 degrees. It is then heated to 64 degrees to 68 degrees and is soured with pure cultures, which are prepared daily. The following morning it is churned at 50 degrees to 54 degrees F. in a Holstein churn, after which the butter is worked in a butter worker, packed in casks, sold and exported to England. The butter is paid for at Copenhagen's top quotation."

It looks very much as if the "enterprising newspaper men who have been 'writing up' the Klondike and life in Dawson City, have been publishing a heap of lies. Inspector Ward, who is stationed at Ekagnay, writes the department at Ottawa and gives a flat contradiction to the stories of shooting and the laxity of enforcing the law at Dawson. "I have interviewed fifteen men," said Mr. Ward, "who have arrived and in response to particular inquiries within the last few days from Dawson of each one of them as to how the law was enforced there, they assured me that a more quiet and law abiding place they never saw. As to the report of shooting scrapes and murders there was no truth in them at all. There was not a man shot or even fired at. The Mounted Police preserved order so well that they would not permit fighting with the fists, far less with guns." Mr. Ward, also says that there will be enough of provisions in Dawson for the people who are there. His letter is dated 18th December.
