ELLEN'S DIARY

Winters' Band Is Broken With Arrival Of March

March? Yes! Incredibly - for how smartly the former winter-months have passed! - March is, by this, here. Come to break Winter's bands; to put a new sign and signs hereabouts. To bring sudden storms? Doubtless. But also to adorn the nights with a crystal charm, to mellow the days; to have the alders by the stream "Shake out their powdery curls" and the Pussy Willows open brown coats in the sunshine along the quiet of the old mill-road.

"I for one, will be happy to see March and the Spring," visitor of this afternoon observed. "The miseries of the winter; colds and the like, will clear away then."

"I don't know whether it is better to have Spring come, or just to look forward to it," James offered with a twinkle. "There's an inspiration in anticipating something pleasant, you know."

"There is," the other agreed. "When we can see nothing promising in the future, nothing to work toward, we might as well..." "...fold hands and wait to die!" James chuckled. "Let's hope, at any rate, we get the best spring yet," the visiting one said.

A keen wind was our lot today. But in a nice compensation, a clear winter-sky, and matching bright cackles from across the yard!

"Here," Alex smiled happily this afternoon, withdrawing treasure from this and that young pocket, "are three new-laid eggs for yours and Grandaddy's supper. Will you like them?"

"Like them!" we beamed.

"It's a frosty morning," Mack commented, about to set out to board the little truck at Jane's end for school this morning. "But it's good it keeps cold! Tomorrow morning we're due to have another school-hockey game."

The farmers at Alderlea -how busy their day was! Stables were cleaned. Not as usual to a far field, but only up the rise from the buildings, the tractor being somewhat hesitant to travel farther today. The cattle-kind from the pole-barn, the more mature and the younger, beat a path to the stream, the sun glinting on their backs, their color making an attractive contrast against the pure white of the snow. . .

The cattle would run clear to its pebbles, below the mill where they drank there in the shelter of the steep wooded rise on the far side. And up the stream, the spillways would be decorated out of respect to the day with edging fringes of white. Muted was today's flow. What sounds our every day affords! "To ears that are expanded," a philosopher has said "what a harp this world is!" "Let's decide now what flowers we will plant this spring," Alex suggested this morning opening a bewitching seed-catalogue.

"What are your favorites?" we questioned.

"Roses are my favorite garden - flowers. . .And my wild-flowers? let me think: daisies . . . buttercups? No. White violets like you find in the woods in the springtime!" he smiled.

So March a moody lady-of-month is here by this. A temperamental one: often brightly smiling, and then sometimes suddenly turning angry for no reason at all. Yet withal, a welcome month.

Until tomorrow — — Diary— Good-night. . .

MARY HAWORTH

College Senior More Ebullient Than Fiance

Dear Mary Haworth: I am a senior in college and plan to marry a wonderful man after graduation. We have been engaged for more than a year but have been going together off and on for about six years.

He is a very devoted, sincere person who treats me like a queen. Although I am more ebullient than he, I do love him very much. But the trouble is, I can't be as devoted as he.

For example, at present I have a frantic urge to date a fraternity man, president of his fraternity chapter. He means little or nothing to me, he is only a challenge. This has happened before in my long courtship with Ben.

Last year at college and this past summer at home I had similar experiences, where men were strongly attracted to me and I very much desired to date them. I didn't, however, for two reasons: 1. The engagement ring on my finger does have meaning and significance to me. 2. I don't want to lose Ben by stepping out on him.

As he is four years my senior, therefore more devoted and stable, he never would understand why I want to date others if I truly love him. This is a constant worry to me, especially as the wedding date draws near.

I don't want to lose him, yet neither do I want to be a wife while knowing in my heart that I am unfaithful, at least in thought if not in deed. Having read your advice to others, I feel you can help me in my dilemma. Thank you. F.P.

Dear F. P.: Could be that you've given a clue to the inner nature of your double-minded approach to marriage, when you say of the current temptation, the fraternity man, that he means little or nothing to you except as a challenge.

A challenge to what? A challenge to miscellaneous experimentation in flirtation, or necking or petting, perhaps?

During the course of your lengthy off-and-on courtship with Ben, have you detoured occasionally into sideline romances with males who were transiently attracted to you, and you to them, by sex magnetism rather than bonafide mutual esteem?

The individual who habitually lends himself to such divertissement runs the risk of becoming eventually somewhat more of a thing than a person, in the embrace of desire.

He is enroute to becoming an addict to auto-erotic feeling; that is to say, to becoming fixedly infatuated with his own body and its repertory of responses to sex stimuli. And as he coasts down this slope, he is progressively forfeiting the human capacity to love a mate devotedly (or as some say: selflessly), with full commitment of mind, heart and spirit —which is the substance of married integrity.

Or possibly your unrest has to do with a tediously narrow dating history. Maybe you've had only Ben as a serious suitor, hence hunger for wider experience by which to determine whether he is the man you would choose, if given a range of choice.

In any case, I can't solve your dilemma; you must do that. But at your age, a senior in college, you would be a fool to marry while straining at the leash to date other men than your fiance. My advise is, get specialist help in trying to uncover and correct the kinks in your emotional make-up, that are giving difficulty. M. H.

Joey Invites British Firms Into Labrador

LONDON (CP) — Premier Joseph Smallwood of Newfoundland has invited British steel companies to invest as co-owners and co-developers in Labrador's new iron ore deposits.

Smallwood told a press conference that British companies should buy a stake in the ore concessions owned by Canadian Javelin Limited.

He said the concessions showed reserves of 750,000,000 tons of ore and the Javelin field, near Wabush Lake, is the only deposit still open to investment from Britain.

"I see no reason why British steel companies can't go into Labrador and avail themselves of this rich opportunity," he said.

Labrador's other iron ore concessions, he said, had passed largely into the hands of companies in the United States, Italy, Germany and Japan.

Smallwood and John Doyle, president of Javelin recently visited Japan and made a similar offer to the expanding Japanese steel companies.

Smallwood said that Newfoundland was the most pro-British of all the Canadian provinces and that the Newfoundland government would prefer British to foreign investment in Labrador.

He noted that eight years ago he had visited Britain and asked British companies to invest in Labrador's natural resources.
