King Seeking Formula To End Greek Crisis

ATHENS (Reuters) - King Constantine and his advisers searched Tuesday night for a new formula to break Greece's lingering political crisis. The 25-year-old king was forced to turn elsewhere when his choice for a compromise premier rejected the assignment. Constantine's man was Stephanos Stephanopoulos, deputy leader of the majority Centre Union party. But the party, led by ousted premier George Papandreu, voted against letting Stephanopoulos take on the job. Tuesday, Stephanopoulos handed the commission back to the king—and the crisis was back at stalemate. A caretaker administration without popular backing in Parliament now rules Greece. Headed by George Athanasiadis Novas, it was the creation of the king. It was set up last month following a quarrel between Papandreu and the king. Last week it was defeated in a confidence vote in Parliament. SEEKS ALTERNATIVE The king now is casting about for alternative constitutional measures to find a more stable government to unite the country. Political observers speculated he might try to form a national government of all political parties—except the United Democratic Left party. Authorities said this grouping is merely a front for the outlawed Greek Communist party. Two men emerged in political circles as possible leaders of a national government—both venerable figures outside Parliament. One is Professor Zenophon Zolotas, 61-year-old scholar and governor of the Bank of Greece. The other is Demetrios Kiousopolos, 73, retired prosecutor-general of the Supreme Court. He was premier in 1952, heading a cabinet that supervised general elections which brought the late Field Marshal Alexander Papagos' "Greek Rally" to power.
