

A Reverie.

As, o'er the earth, pale twilight grew,
And birds winged swiftly to their nest,
At night her mantles softly drew
Sweet heralds of approaching rest,—
I slowly turned my day-worn step
Towards the place where, long in gloom,
The village dead have calmly slept
Within the earth's dark narrow womb.

The moon through the fleecy clouds now rode,
And the everlasting stars above,
Seemed the heavenly vault to overload
With their bright orbs bespeaking love;
And, nodding in the wind that blew,
Beneath my feet the vernal flowers,
Their shaded petals moist with dew,
Breathed incense to the darkling hours.

I, here among the cells around,
In silence sat and counted o'er
The forms within the holy ground,
Whose sleep will last for evermore.
Among them in its cold embrace
Are those with whom, in life's fair morn,
I frolicked round the very place
That from my sight now shields their form.

Here sleep without dissenting words
The rich man by the poor man's side,
The beggars by the pompous lords,
For death puts all but death aside;
And as bright gems beneath the wave,
As flowers unwatered by our tears,
She lays them in a common grave
With naught to mark their death or years.

But, like the buzzing moth that flies
Towards the light where in the flames
The wretch in awful agony dies,
We mortals earthly goods still claim,
Though as the prickly thorns entwined
With o'er the softest seeming rose
Masking in life great wealth may find,
Means anything but calm repose.

Around the winds that mournfully sighed
With all the night's lone voices said,
Behold the pomp of human pride
That has the mortal body wed.
A' I sat, my frame awake with cold,
Here pondering o'er the ways of man,
Till me the bell in the belfry told
That night had fled and day began.

Russian Women.

It has often been said that the Russian government has a peculiar and especial dread of the educated young women who have espoused the cause of Nihilism, and of their influence over the young, whose studies they share in the colleges and universities. For a woman convicted of participation in Nihilists' plots there is no mercy. She is doomed from the outset. Five prisoners were tried in St. Petersburg on Monday for complicity in a plot to kill the Czar. Two of these, officers of the army, were acquitted. The remaining three, two men and one woman, were found equally guilty, and condemned to be hanged. But the court, in the case of the two men, recommended that the Czar remit the sentence of death and that banishment to Siberia be substituted, but in the case of the woman no such recommendation was made, and she will no doubt be hanged. There seems to be an infatuation among a certain class—and it is an educated and an excellent class—of Russian women to devote their lives to the cause of the revolutionists, and whenever one of their number is convicted and hanged she is looked upon as a martyr to her country, and new recruits spring up and take her place. As a means of suppressing Nihilism, especially among the women, hanging is a failure.
