Eden's Term At Downing Street Marked By Troubles

LONDON (AP)—Sir Anthony Eden spent a lifetime training to become prime minister, grasped the glittering prize 21 months ago and then saw it slowly slip from his hands. The one-time golden boy of British politics went from crisis to crisis at home and abroad as soon as he became prime minister. Eden labored for years bringing British-American relations to blossom. Then, this same Eden, now 69, by his policies placed a strain on those relations without precedent in this century. Even Eden's political enemies conceded that few British leaders have played it harder luck. He was the big loser in the abortive election in Egypt. Eden's troubles started almost at the moment Sir Winston Churchill, the man who had guided him to the top, turned over the prime minister's seat to his care.

PAPERS ON STRIKE

A national newspaper strike was in progress when Eden attained the highest political office in the land on April 6, 1955. He called a general election the following month and the Conservative party was returned to office with increased strength in the House of Commons. But even this triumph was marred. Three days before the election thousands of dock workers went on strike. Before the new Parliament had time to meet, labor troubles on the nationalized railways caused Eden to declare a state of emergency. These disputes soon were settled, but they left their mark on Britain's economy, balanced on a knife edge as it has been since the war.

GENEVA MEETING

The Geneva Summit conference of 1955 gave prospects of easing East-West tensions but a final end of the cold war eluded Eden and other leaders of the Western powers. Through the half half of 1955 criticism mounted against the administrative policies of Eden's government at home. There was concern because Britain had to struggle so hard to keep the pound looking the dollar in the face. Some newspapers, including a few who support Eden's Conservative party, accused the cabinet of uncertainty, indecisiveness, and timidity. Eden himself was described as a "ditherer."

MIDEAST TROUBLES

Then, as the months rolled along, Eden found himself involved deeper in the troubles of the Middle East. He was acting as host for King Faisal of Iraq last July 26 when he was handed a dispatch announcing Egyptian President Nasser's nationalization of the Suez Canal. Persons present said Eden never batted an eye. He continued talking with his guests and bade them goodbye with traditional grace. Then he called an immediate meeting of senior cabinet ministers. In the months of negotiations among the world's maritime powers and with the Egyptians, Eden often worked 20 hours a day. He still was as faultlessly dressed as ever, but his face showed the strain when he appeared in the House of Commons. British and French troops invaded Egypt Nov. 5, and Eden's troubles piled higher. From the United States came word that President Eisenhower had not been consulted about the attack and felt it was wrong.

OPPOSITION HIT HARD

At home the opposition Labor party hammered at Eden. Demonstrations of trade unions called for "law—not war." United Nations condemnation strengthened Eden's critics. Under the mounting pressures at home and abroad, Eden ordered a cease-fire and later the evacuation of the forces which had occupied the northern end of the canal. Still he defended his actions, telling cheering young Conservatives on Nov. 17: "We make no apology and will never make one for the action which we and our French allies took together." Harried and tired Eden was told by his doctors on Nov. 22 that he was suffering from overwork and strain and was advised to rest. He went to Jamaica for three weeks while his lieutenants wound up the Suez affair. When he came back home he found Britain and Western Europe suffering from an oil shortage and a slim economic diet as an aftermath of the closing of the Suez Canal. He let it be known he would welcome an opportunity to talk things over with President Eisenhower but there was no White House invitation. Eden, an officer in the First World War, combines determination—some call it stubbornness—with courage. During his long tenure as foreign secretary he made the black hound but his personal symbol "because I look such a fool in a bowler." Educated at Eton and Oxford, Eden typified the upper class Englishman who regards public service as the highest duty.

MAN WITH FUTURE

He first entered Parliament in 1923. Regarded from the first as a man with a future he became foreign secretary in 1935. He was 38 at the time, the youngest man to hold that post in nearly a century. He struggled tirelessly to make the League of Nations work and then resigned in 1939 when he found Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain going behind his back to appease dictators Hitler and Mussolini. His break with Chamberlain actually helped his career. Churchill stood at his side and once described Eden as "the only fresh figure of first magnitude arising out of the generation ravaged by the (first) great war." During the Second World War Eden served as Dominions secretary, under Chamberlain, and war secretary and foreign secretary under Churchill. The Labor party came to power in 1945 putting both Churchill and Eden in opposition. When Churchill came back as prime minister following the Conservative victory of October, 1951, Eden again became foreign secretary, and stayed until he rose to prime minister in 1955. Eden was the first divorced man ever to hold the office. The year he entered Parliament Eden married Beatrice Beckett, daughter of a wealthy banker and newspaper director. The marriage ended in divorce in 1950. Mrs. Eden complained that her husband spent so much time at international conferences, at the foreign office and attending House of Commons debates that they had no time for home life. In 1952 he married Churchill's niece, Clarissa Spencer-Churchill. Unlike his first wife, she relishes politics. Eden was made a Knight of the Garter, one of the world's oldest knightly orders, in 1954. Two other former prime ministers, Churchill and Earl Attlee, also are members of that order.

Yemen Involved In Heated Controversy With Britain

LONDON (AP)—Britain has sent a strong protest to Yemen accusing the Arab kingdom of border raids on the British-protected sheikdoms at the southern end of the Arabian Peninsula.

Yemen countered with new accusations that British armored columns assaulted tribesmen along the undefined frontier between Yemen and the western Aden protectorate. The latest Yemen communique alleged the British ambushed and killed an Aden protectorate prince who resisted British plans for his suzerainty.

It also claimed the British attacked a Yemen tribe with armored cars killing 10 civilians and that Yemen horsemen repulsed the raid and set afire five armored cars.

Yemen has accused Britain of "aggression" against its towns and repression of the sheikdoms in the protectorate. It says Britain is trying to solidify her position by incorporating the sheikdoms into a federation.

Britain says Yemen tribesmen for several years have raided Aden territory and stirred up dissidents in the protectorate, in an attempt to weld them into her own territory.

The foreign office handed a note of protest to the Yemen charge d'affaires in London. It said that tribesmen from Yemen occupied the site of a ruins at Al Hajar, inside the protectorate, Dec. 31 and were attacked by RAF planes.
