Various Aspects Of Cancer Discussed By Researchers

NEW ORLEANS (AP)—Are the strange virus-like particles found in many cancers really viruses? Some of them are, a Texas cancer researcher said here. But he also thought that others may be crippled or dormant forms of bacteria, lowered in activity by a meeting with antibodies or other cell-damaging forces.

There is an odd and mysterious mixture of forms found both inside and outside cancer cells, explained Dr. John A. Sykes of M.D. Anderson Hospital and Tumor Institute, Houston.

Because of standard ways of staining them to make them microscopically visible, they can be mistaken for a number of things, he told a science writers' seminar of the American Cancer Society.

SEE BACTERIA
Still, despite the viruses present, there were also present in tumors a number of bacterial objects. Some researchers have found an extremely small-sized type of bacteria, or something resembling them, around cancer cells.

One researcher estimated that 40 per cent of the cases of human leukemia—lymphoma—diseases of the blood and blood-forming organs—showed the presence of one of these extremely small bacteria.

Sykes asked whether these were indeed new bacteria, or merely the handicapped remains of bacteria disabled in an unequal war with chemicals, antibiotics, or radiation or other injuring sources.

The problem still remains to be decided: What are these bacteria—like organisms, or bacteria themselves doing at the cancer site? Do they precede a virus infection or follow it? Does it help or hinder the progress of leukemia in man? Other researchers have asked these questions too—so far to no avail.
