MARY HAWORTH

Dad's Vulgarity Shown In Children's Behavior

Dear Mary Haworth: I have a wonderful husband and three children. Except for an over-budget, we have just about everything we need for a happy marriage. But after 11 years together, Harry and I have a difference that we just can't conquer, it seems.

My mother stressed good manners while rearing me. My husband's mother was too busy keeping a spotless house; and she thought manners were something you pick up through associating with people. Result: my husband is on his good behavior in company; but with family, he acts crude (in my opinion). Children learn manners from their parents' actions, I think. And though I don't feel we should maintain company behavior at all, still I believe that we should give them a consistently good example.

DETAINED BY REDS HONG KONG (Reuters)—Three British residents of Hong Kong and one Chinese, missing in a small boat since Aug. 22, are being detained in Communist China it was reported Tuesday.

SMALL SON LIKE DAD
Things my husband does, that I disapprove, may seem small when I mention them later; but at the time, they completely revolt me. For example: He is out of town at present. But this morning our son, age 6, motioned for me to bend down, as if he wished to kiss me. Then he burped into my ear!

I was astounded and shocked, and scolded him good. He replied that daddy does that to him all the time. I try to teach the children right from wrong, good manners, and to be considerate of others. But when something like this incident happens, I feel: "What's the use?"

I am not a martinet about manners; but I try at least to give them a worthy example to follow. This is something my husband and I cannot discuss without having a quarrel. And I would much appreciate your opinion as to whether I am being overly sensitive in the matter. Thank you, P.C.

Dear P.C.: I am sorry to say that I too am revolted by the incident you describe. Your small son's prank, imputed to his father's example, is nauseatingly vulgar.

The lad must have known (in his bones, if not consciously) that he was setting a trap to get your goat—and thus he deserved a good scolding. Let us hope that it shook him up, sufficiently to stick in his memory as a reminder never to behave so boorishly again—at least not with you.

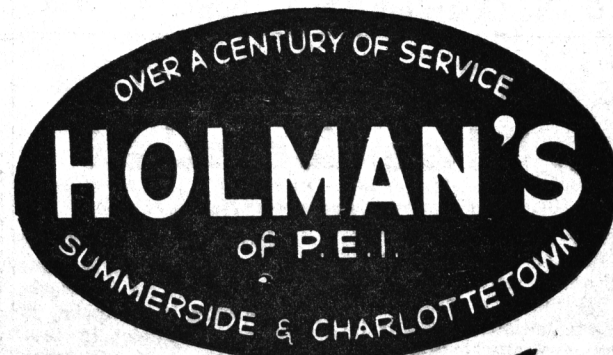

It is indeed true that children derive their actions and reactions from the substance of their parents' characteristic performance. That's why I surmise that your son knew he was needling you, in playing like dad, offensively. No doubt he is aware (intuitively, if not with reasoned clarity; that there are two schools of manners on the parental level in his house—each in conflict with the other.

In response to this awareness, he is impelled irresistibly to experiment with the "tabu" brand, that you disapprove. That's child nature.

CHILD MUST PAY
So he brings trouble upon himself. He encounters the thunderbolt of your outrage—for which don't apologize. Rather I say, hurry for your side. It is right and proper that you should be intolerant of that sort of thing. But it is an instance of the child's paying, painfully, for the bull-headed selfishness of the dad who willfully misleads him into disgusting practices.

Possibly the penalty the child pays, for the father's bad example, won't stop there. It is quite conceivable that the boy will organize his personality around the misconception that grossness and vulgarity, and disregard for fine sensibilities in women, are primary attributes of masculine gender. This he may grow up to be irreversibly vulgar and callous—a bias that would bring him into association with "birds of a feather" in later life, and also of course, damage any marriage he might make.

To sum up, you're certainly not overly sensitive in your dismay; and I think you should stand your ground in any quarrels on the subject. M.V.
