Vanishing 17th Century Maps Add To Kidd Treasure Mystery

By JOSEPH MACSWEEN LONDON (CP)—A new twist was reported Wednesday in the apparently ever-enduring mystery of Captain Kidd's pirate treasure. Four 17th-century maps have disappeared—and some treasure buffs believe the parchments may hold the secret of the exact place where the buccaner buried his loot on Oak Island, N.S. The maps were found years ago in a sea chest believed to have belonged to the pirate. Eric Seldon, antique dealer in Eastbourne, said in a telephone interview he believes the maps were handed over to another person by Mrs. Elizabeth Dick, who died last year at 77. Seldon, an agent for Canadian Carl Graeser, killed while digging on Oak Island for the treasure, added he believes he knows who obtained the maps. MYSTERY FIGURE He declined to name the mystery figure but answered "could be" when asked whether the new owner is an Englishman. The London Evening Standard, meanwhile, quotes E. A. Furbear, Mrs. Dick's nearest relative, as saying: "I know that my aunt did have the charts or maps and also the sea-chest. I think she probably sold them. . . . She is inclined to be secretive in such matters." Seldon said the elderly Mrs. Dick told "meandering" stories and it was difficult to get at hard facts. She recalled finding in a secret compartment of Captain Kidd's sea-chest a prayer scroll. Contrary to popular belief, the famed pirate was a religious man, Seldon explained.

Mr. Shaw, in dealing with the free school book situation here on P.E.I. noted that he had checked with some of the Department of Education officials to find out when the pupils will receive all their books. British Austerity Program Claimed To Have Good Start

TORONTO (CP) — Britain's recently launched austerity program is off to a good start and will result in a national surplus by next year, James Callaghan, chancellor of the exchequer, predicts. "Already, the price and income freeze is showing considerable results," he told a press conference. "The British public is swinging towards the fact that higher prices matter. Why only six weeks after we introduced austerity measures, public polls showed substantial backing of the government for these actions."

DALTON — Continued from page 1 interpreted as a grass-roots expression on leadership." Mr. Dinsdale said. Heath Macquarrie, MP for Queens, said he has a high regard for Mr. Camp and the leadership question is a legitimate one for the party president to raise. David MacDonald, rookie Conservative MP for the Prince Edward Island riding of Prince, was among those who said Wednesday they would support a move for a leadership convention. Edward Nasserden, member for the Saskatchewan riding of Rosthern, however, said there was no need for a leadership convention. Other Conservatives who would like to see a leadership change appeared to be taking a hands-off line this time after previous unsuccessful attempts. They suggested that if Mr. Diefenbaker is forced out the party might be so badly split the damage couldn't be repaired. The task of rebuilding the party in Quebec was big enough without facing a new leader with the job of pacifying the West and even the Maritimes, where there are pro and anti-Diefenbaker factions. Mr. Camp speaks to the Prince Edward Island Progressive Conservative Association Sunday in Charlottetown. Mr. Camp, in a Toronto speech Tuesday night, put his job as party president on the line in a bid to force a leadership showdown. He said the leadership had to be "reconfirmed, or otherwise."

MISSIONS WILL EXPLORE Early reports indicated British investment abroad is not on the increase and several trade missions were being launched to capture a greater share of the world's export market for Britain. Mr. Callaghan said that the British pound is firm and is "standing on its own two feet." He discounted reports Britain will ask the International Monetary Fund for aid when Mr. Callaghan goes to Washington following a meeting of Commonwealth finance ministers at Montreal this week. But Mr. Callaghan said the austerity program will not solve all of Britain's problems. "What we hope will evolve from this temporary price and wage freeze is a lasting and long-term fiscal policy on which Britain can depend." Mr. Callaghan said lack of membership in the European

New Methods Made Possible

MONTAGUE — Two methods of building a modern up-to-date golf course at Brudenell were made possible by the provincial government through the minister, Dr. M.L. Bonnell, previous to a general meeting of the club on Tuesday evening. They are: the club could hold a 99 year lease on the property and build the club or the government would build the course, retain the property for lease, and maintain the course.

The previous government had purchased the property for a golf course and the members which number over 300 began to build a rough course with the hope it would be eventually taken over by some section of the government and completed. The members after considerable discussion pro and con decided the second method would be the better for a number of reasons. The course could be built immediately where if they were to continue under the present system it could be years before it would be completed. This will mean it will be a public course with a club membership fees with these fees being retained by the club, but the green fees will go to the government.

Following the decision to accept the second method Rev. Preston Hammill, chairman of the association with his executive was directed by the meeting to ask for the following to be given consideration: 1. The government would retain the land. 2. They build the course beginning immediately. 3. The building (home) be leased to the club with the club guaranteeing living quarters for a caretaker and 4. that an 18-hole course be built.

It was time both Liberal and Conservative leaders reappraised their positions. The leadership job wasn't "a lifetime contract."

The Toronto speech apparently was the beginning of a series across Canada aimed at building support for a leadership convention among the 1,500 delegates who will gather at the party's annual meeting here Nov. 13-16.

NO TO REPLY TODAY Mr. Diefenbaker was expected to reply to the Camp onslaught in a speech in Toronto today. The Conservative leader said on his 71st birthday last weekend that he intends to lead the party in the next federal election, whenever it is called.
