MARY HAWORTH

Work-Centered Son Is Robot Not Human

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: Should a man involve himself so much in his job that the only leisure he spends with his family is at job-connected social gatherings, or shopping trips when he wants to buy something for himself?

My son seems to feel his work is the most important thing in his life and that it is his wife's duty to be equally interested in it.

She is a wonderful person who goes along with him in most everything, including frequent household moves, related to his pursuit of better paying jobs.

Edith likes to go out socially more than Bob, but makes few demands on his time. She occupies herself with domestic interests, reading, etc., and takes so many vacations occasionally. Seldom has Bob vacationed with her and, even then, he complains to an extent, that he spoils it for her.

Due to guilt feelings about his neglect of her, he often proposes taking her on vacations, but backs down when the time comes.

I consider the situation unhealthy for her. Hence my question: Is a husband's sole obligation that of providing his family a living? When I've shared Bob, he says Edith could shroud more of his life if he would throw herself into what he is doing.

But his concept of correct wife involvement in his work is just for her to listen to his shop talk, praise his activities and agree with his views, without ever having any ideas or suggestions of her own. Seemingly he wants only a sounding board, so I can well understand why she feels shut out.

I would appreciate any insights you may offer, towards improving their understanding of the difficulty.

A. A.

DEAR A. A.: It could be that you are Edith, inviting a discussion of Bob's escapist attitude towards the psychological tensions of married togetherness.

Few indeed are the mothers of married sons who could identify so fully and warmly with the son's wife, in instances where the son is behaving with marked immaturity or sly irresponsibility with regard to his obligations as helpmate.

The mother of this breed of man is unusually protective of her handiwork and, perhaps with unconscious care, has shaped him to a pattern of being and doing that tends to keep him involuntarily on the defensive against self-sharing. By this negative achievement, she more or less earmarks him as her boy for keeps.

So much for preface. In my view the husband who lives for his work, to the extent that you describe, is more of a robot than a human being, in the role he has chosen. Inwardly he is a bleak neurotic, conspicuously committed to his job as a means of making his best possible social showing, he thinks.

He is hiding out, figuratively at a foggy distance from the self-revealing aspects of marriage fully undertaken. He is on the run from his own distrustful sense of personal inadequacy in relation to woman-kind.

If he were profoundly at peace with himself, on the score of feeling deeply confident of his intrinsic worth and lovability as a man, quite aside from his operations in the field of commerce, he would easily find fellowship time for his family and still do well on the job, indeed probably better than he does now.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Most Satisfying Joy Found In The Familiar

We recall so many items from the day which goes now out through the dim and damp of the May night. We remember most of all the feeling of sadness which descended on the family this evening when they learned of the sudden and untimely passing of a farmwife. She was a young woman, a dark-eyed girl one of three children born to and reared in a home in the village which to the north sits prettily at an end of this road. Her childhood - the growing-up time - as are youthful years, was spent happily. Continued happiness was assured in her marriage. And this, to human sights, was to have been one of her happiest days of all. Tonight however, a babe remains, to be well loved we are sure, yet never to know the tender touch and look, the deep affection that is a mother's love. Her girlhood friends, and she had many young and older, for she was ever one to give out the cheerful word and the infectious smile and chuckle, will sorrow deeply over her sudden going and sympathize deeply with her husband and parents and all her loved ones in this, their great loss.

We remember too of our day, its joys, of which none is more satisfying, as we have said, than to follow on its familiar paths: to tidy a room, to plan and spread meals - to look off over the fields and feel that warm kinship with the soil and its ways, which is to be experienced when footsteps fall against the home sod; to watch the play of sunlight on the valley after a night-shower, to see the green deepening along the hillside, to hear the voice of the spring wind, and altogether love each day that comes.

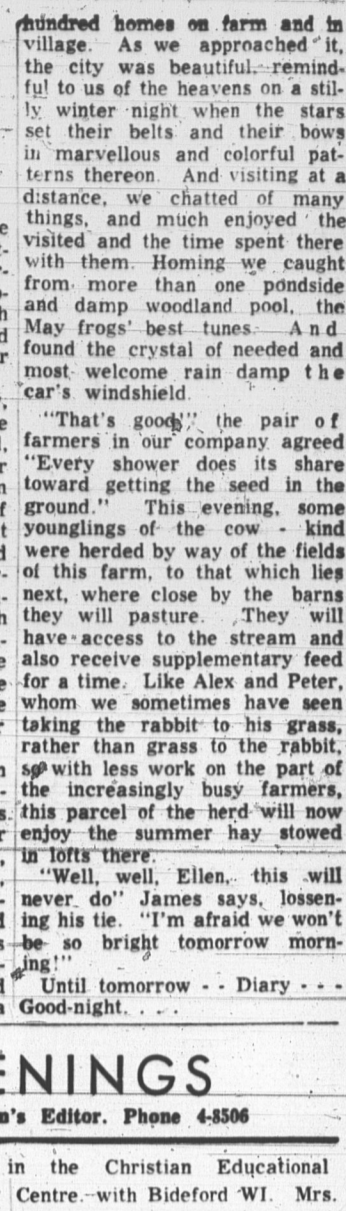

We think too of an outing, an enjoyable, and unplanned for excursion, we took with James and friends this evening, after his chores were done. We saw, as we drove along island roads, the twilight fall, and the twilight fall, in all the beauty and serenity of a quiet and windless May evening. The car faced toward the sunrise corner, and presently lights shone from a hundred homes on farm and in village. As we approached it, the city was beautiful - reminding us of the heavens on a still winter night when the stars set their belts and their bows in marvellous and colorful patterns thereon. And visiting at a distance, we chatted of many things, and much enjoyed the visited and the time spent there with them. Homing we caught from more than one pondside and damp woodland pool, the May frogs' best tunes. And found the crystal of needed and most welcome rain damp the car's windshield.

"That's good," the pair of farmers in our company agreed. "Every shower does its share toward getting the seed in the ground." This evening, some younglings of the cow - kind were herded by way of the fields of this farm, to that which lies next, where close by the barns they will pasture. They will have access to the stream and also receive supplementary feed for a time. Like Alex and Peter, whom we sometimes have seen taking the rabbit to his grass, rather than grass to the rabbit, so with less work on the part of the increasingly busy farmers, this parcel of the herd will now enjoy the summer hay stowed in lofts there.

"Well, well, Ellen, this will never do," James says, loosening his tie. "I'm afraid we won't be so quiet and windless tomorrow."

Until tomorrow - Diary - - Good-night.
