Bismarck's Great Speech. THE PRINCE DISCUSSES THE LEADING QUESTIONS OF THE DAY.

During the discussion on the Tobacco Monopoly bill, Prince Bismarck made a long and somewhat passionate, or at least personal, speech in reply to the arguments urged by the Progressist champion, Herr Richter, in the course of which he let fall some interesting general remarks on the position and prospects of Germany. Referring to the obvious aim of the ultra-Liberals to reduce the Military Budget, the Chancellor said: "Do you think that it gives me pleasure to keep such a high army on foot? I know not if this be the case with France and Russia, but I can assure you that the millions of bayonets of our neighbours are pointed to the centre of Europe as to a magnet. Our geographical position will always make us the object of our enemies' attention. Formerly our own weakness was also in our way. Why may we not have coalitions against us, as in the time of Frederick the Great? In my management of our foreign policy since 1871 I have always frustrated such mighty combinations, but my efforts could have been of no avail without our military organization and without the respect entertained abroad for our good bayonets. In view of the slightly developed national feeling of our countrymen, our (Transhenish) neighbors do not abandon the hope of getting the Germans back to them, as centuries ago the Alsace-Lorrainers preferred the ivory of France to the garb of the free German peasant. And how, then is our Army Budget to be reduced?"

Proceeding then to speak of the monstrous evils of so many party factions, the Prince remarked: "It is quite true, as Herr Richter said, that it is becoming more and more difficult for the Chancellor to rule with a Parliament. You can also see this with my colleague Gladstone. Formerly it was easy in England to govern with a Parliament as long as there were two, and only two, parties, Whigs and Tories, who had both an interest in the greatness of England. But in that country, too, government has become more difficult, and the mechanism of it more unmanageable, by the appearance of the Catholic and the Irish party. But I must not be reproached with finding it more difficult to rule Parliament itself. Where would you find a Minister who has governed twenty years (in succession) but myself? Not among ourselves, and much less so elsewhere. I cannot be quite so reactionary as they make me out. But with such a majority I cannot govern, and no one can."

Referring to protection, in his reply to Herr Bamberger, an ardent free-trader, the Chancellor said: "We did not get protection from abroad, we had it formerly in Germany. All protective nations are to a certain extent well to do—France, for example, despite her huge losses and her colossal military burden, which she bears with a cheerfulness that we might imitate. America, too, makes a very good thing of her protective tariff, and pays debts with it. Other nations are always raising their duties, and England only has discarded them after becoming a strong and muscular champion that can challenge any one. England in this respect is a full-grown child."

The well-known stock raiser and agriculturist, Mr. John E. Couse, of Plympton, county of Lambton, has received a distinction of honor in his vocation which has been attained by few Canadian farmers. In 1878 Mr. Couse sent samples of different farm products through the Minister of Agriculture, to the Paris Universal Exhibition held in that year. Nothing more was heard regarding the matter until last Monday, when Mr. Couse received a letter from the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa enclosing a certificate from Paris to the effect that he had been awarded the gold medal and diploma for the best white beans on exhibition.

There is a pathetic and poetical story told about James Thomson, the author of 'The City of Dreadful Night.' In his youth he was in the British Army, and was betrothed to a beautiful girl, from whom the demands of military life temporarily separated him. One day he received news of her slight illness, and on the next came without further warning the news of her sudden death. The young poet fell senseless to the ground, and for many weeks lay dangerously ill. He arose reckless and delirious, and, as if by magic, George Eliot once wrote to him a note of hearty admiration for his best known poem.
